Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, today I join my colleague, Senator TRIBLE, in introducing legislation to correct a pay problem of the Federal Aviation Administration Airport Police.

The Federal police officers serving at National and Dulles Airports are presently earning $3,200 to $6,600 less than salaries for police officers at the Library of Congress and Park Service.

In fact, the only pay relief in the past 15 years given these officers was in 1974. Since that time, the various efforts to try and alleviate the problem have not been successful.

This legislation will establish a mechanism similar to existing legislation that provides special pay rates for such police forces as the Library of Congress Police, National Zoo Police, and U.S. Park Police.

Due to the present salary levels, the Airport Police Force has become a training school for other area police departments; as soon as they have received their training, they leave for better paying positions with other area departments.

Congressman WOLF has introduced this legislation in the other body and is to be congratulated for his leadership.

Mr. President, the public deserves the best protection possible at our two airports. The police officers deserve equitable pay to their counterparts in the Federal service. This bill will answer both needs and I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. PELL, and Mr. BURDICK):

S. 2263. A bill to amend title 23, United States Code, to reduce the amount of certain Federal-aid highway funds for any State in which the minimum age for the purchase or public possession of alcoholic beverages is less than 21 years; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

THE UNIFORM DRINKING AGE OF 1984

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to implement one of the principal findings of the Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving which issued its final report in November. This legislation would make it the policy of the United States to encourage all States to adopt 21 as the legal minimum age for the purchase and public possession of alcoholic beverages.

I am pleased to be joined in this effort by the Senator from Rhode Island, Senator PELL, and the Senator from North Dakota, Senator BURDICK, both whom have long been involved in the cause of combating drunk driving. It is particularly gratifying to have the support of Senator PELL, who was a member of the Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving.

Mr. President, a while ago, I examined the report of the National Transportation Safety Board issued in July 1982 which recommended raising the minimum age to 21. Their report begins with the account of an accident which warrants repeating:

At about 2:18 a.m. on the morning of March 14, 1982, at a railroad/highway grade crossing in Nassau County, NY, a van with 10 teenagers in it attempted to drive around a lowered automatic gate with flashing lights and was hit by an oncoming train. Nine of the 10 teenagers were killed. The blood alcohol content of the 19 year old owner and apparent driver was .09. A BAC level of .06 is evidence that the driver is impaired. A level of .10 is considered to be "intoxicated." The legal minimum drinking age in the state of New York is 19.

In July 1974, the State of Virginia lowered its legal drinking age to 18. In 1973, there were 1,900 alcohol-related crashes involving 16 to 20-year-olds. In 1974, there were 2,600, an increase of 36 percent. In 1979, there were 4,300 such crashes, an increase of 215 percent.

Mr. President, in my State of New Jersey we raised the minimum drinking age to 21 in January 1983. In the first 6 months of 1982, alcohol-related fatalities involving those 17 to 21 totaled 38. In the first 6 months of 1983, that number dropped to 16. We have a problem in New Jersey known as border slaughter, because our neighboring State of New York has a lower legal minimum. The President's Commission addressed this problem of adjoining States having differing ages in its report as follows:

The lack of uniformity among the state laws is especially critical regarding the minimum legal drinking age because an incentive to drink and drive is established due to young persons commuting to border states where the drinking age is lower. There is simply no way to adequately address the needless tragedies caused by young persons commuting to border states except by establishing a uniform drinking age among the states.

The bill I am introducing today is designed to address this problem. I want to stress that the approach taken in this bill is strong medicine. A State which fails to make substantial progress to adopt 21 as its legal minimum age would face a gradual loss of highway funding. This approach is the one recommended by the President's Commission. It is essentially the same approach taken to enforce the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit. We are all familiar with the saying "55 saves lives." This bill will save lives.

The Insurance Institute for Highway Safety has studied the effect of the 21-year-old minimum. In eight of the nine States studied, the Insurance Institute found a 28-percent reduction in alcohol-related accidents where the legal minimum has been raised. The National Transportation Safety Board stated in its 1982 report:

Available data show a direct correlation between minimum drinking age and alcohol-related accidents in the 18- to 21-year-old age group.

Mr. President, this concept of a 21 minimum drinking age is not new to either the Congress or the American people. Forty-two percent of this Nation's population live under the 21-year-old minimum right now. In the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982—Public Law 97-424—section 209, Congress made it clear that it strongly endorsed the 21-year-old minimum. There have been numerous resolutions urging a fight against drunk driving introduced in the Senate and House; I have supported them. If we are to get a uniform minimum age, now is the time to act.

I am one Senator who strongly supports Federal assistance to construct, repair, and maintain our Nation's highways. I do not relish the thought of denying valuable assistance to the States. I weigh that reluctance against the findings of the Presidential Commission and the facts I have already cited. I weigh it also knowing that every year there are thousands of victims of drunk driving across this Nation.

Mr. President, a recent Gallup poll indicates that 77 percent of the American people support 21 as the minimum legal drinking age. Even those directly affected, between the ages of 16 to 20, favored the adoption of 21 as the minimum age 58 percent of the time.

I believe the American people will support a 21-year-old uniform minimum drinking age. The question, is, will we act to insure that this goal is reached as soon as possible?

The civil rights movement has a saying, Mr. President, which is applicable here. "How long" is the question, how long to achieve the goal of equal rights? The answer from those committed to that goal is "Not long." And so we ask, "How long" will it be to achieve this goal which will save young lives? I hope my colleagues will answer and answer soon, "Not long."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 2264. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase the maximum amounts of the specially adapted housing assistance grants provided to certain severely, service-connected disabled veterans; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

VETERANS' SPECIALLY ADAPTED HOUSING ASSISTANCE INCREASE

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am introducing today S. 2264, a bill to provide a counterinflationary increase in the maximum amount of the specially adapted housing assistance grant provided by the Veterans' Administration to certain veterans with total and permanent service-connected disabilities. The maximum amount of this grant would be increased by 17 percent, from $32,500 to $38,000, effective October 1, 1984. It would also provide, effective October 1, 1984, an increase of 20 percent, from $5,000 to $6,000, in the maximum amount of the specially adapted housing assistance grant provided to certain service-connected disabled veterans who suffer from total blindness or who have lost or lose the use of both upper extremities. Joining me as cosponsors are Senators RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, and DECONCINI.

Under the program of specially adapted housing assistance for disabled veterans provided for in chapter 21 of title 38, United States Code—often referred to as the wheelchair home program—the VA assists veterans with certain permanent and total service-connected disabilities involving mobility impairments in aquiring suitable housing with adaptations made necessary by the nature of their disabilities. Under current law, these disabled veterans are eligible for a grant in an amount not to exceed 50 percent of the cost of the home and necessary land, up to a maximum of $32,500.

Veterans eligible for housing assistance grants are principally quadraplegics, paraplegics, amputees, and others who require the use of a wheelchair, braces, or crutches to move about. Their disabling conditions may require ramps, special bathroom equipment, extra-large rooms and hallways, and other adaptations that are essential for their health and safety.

For the value of this important benefit for such a deserving group of veterans to be protected from being eroded by inflation, periodic increases in the maximum amount of the grant must be provided. When originally enacted in Public Law 80-702 in 1948, the specially adapted housing program provided for assistance of up to $10,000. At that time, the average cost of construction for a new single-family residence was $7,800. Housing construction costs have risen steadily since then, and the maximum amount of assistance has been increased on five occasions. The last increase, effective October 17, 1981, was made by the enactment of legislation that I authored, enacted in section 502(1) of Public Law 97-66. At that time, according to the National Association of Home Builders, the median cost of a home in the United States was $68,000. In 1984, that cost is projected to increase to $80,400—an almost 17-percent increase. By raising the maximum limit by nearly 17 percent, from $32,500 to $38,000, our measure would help ensure that this benefit keeps pace with increases in housing costs over the last 3½ years.

In addition, the measure would increase, effective October 1, 1984, the maximum amount of assistance for special housing adaptations that is available to certain veterans suffering from service-connected total blindness or the loss or loss of use of both upper extremities. This program of assistance, payable pursuant to section 801(b) of title 38, was enacted in legislation I authored in 1980—section 301 of Public Law 96-385. Under this program, an eligible veteran is entitled to assistance up to a maximum amount of $5,000, in making special adaptations that the Administrator determines are reasonably necessary because of the veteran's disability. This maximum amount has not been increased since the program began in 1980. Over that period of time—from October 1980 through December 1983—the Consumer Price Index has risen by just over 20 percent. Thus, our amendment would provide for an increase of 20 percent—from $5,000 to $6,000—in the maximum amount of assistance to which a veteran is entitled under this program.

In fiscal year 1983, a total of 566 grants for special adapted housing assistance under the two VA programs were made to veterans and the average benefit payment was $25,056. In fiscal year 1984, 520 grants, averaging $26,683, are expected to be made, and in fiscal year 1985, 500 grants with an average benefit payment of $27,000 are anticipated.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of S. 2264 be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed on the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2264

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 802 of title 38, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (a), by striking out "$32,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$38,800"; and

(2) in subsection (b), by striking out "$5,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,000."

(b) The amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1984.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 2265. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase the maximum amounts of Veterans' Administration home-loan guarantee; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOME-LOAN GUARANTY INCREASES

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am today introducing S. 2265, a bill to increase, effective October 1, 1984, the maximum amounts of veterans' home-loan guaranties. This measure would increase by 27 percent, from $27,500 to $35,000, the maximum amount of the Veterans' Administration loan-guaranty entitlement available to a veteran for the purchase of a conventional home, a single-family residential unit in a condominium, or a farm residence. In addition, the measure would increase by 10 percent, from $20,000 to $22,000, the maximum guaranty for purchases of manufactured homes—formerly known as mobile homes. Joining me as cosponsors are Senators RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, and DECONCINI.

The VA loan guaranty is designed to substitute, in large measure, for the down payment that would otherwise be required when a veteran purchases a home. Under current law, the guaranty is limited to 60 percent of the loan amount or $27,500, whichever is the lesser, with regard to conventionally built homes and condominium apartments, and 50 percent or $20,000, whichever is the lesser, in the case of manufactured homes. Lenders are thus assured of the substantial protection afforded by the VA loan guaranty and are generally willing to make loans to veterans without the necessity of a down payment or with a lower down payment than would otherwise be required.

Mr. President, as my colleagues are well aware, housing prices have risen substantially since the most recent increase in the VA loan-guaranty maximum which was enacted by the Congress in 1980 based on an amendment I proposed. According to data provided by the National Association of Home Builders, the median cost of a home in the United States in 1980 was $64,600. In 1984, it is estimated that the median cost will rise to $80,400—an increase of almost 25 percent. Thus, by raising the guaranty by approximately 27 percent to $35,000, we would be insuring that the value of the VA home-loan guaranty keeps pace with increases in the housing market.

In the case of manufactured homes, Department of Commerce data show that, from the third quarter of 1980—1 week after which the last increase in the maximum guaranty was enacted—through the second quarter of 1983, the average sale price of a manufactured home increased by 5 percent. Assuming an additional 5-percent inflationary impact from July 1983 through October 1984, a 10-percent increase in the maximum—from $20,000 to $22,000—would protect that benefit from inflation.

Mr. President, I believe that as more and more veterans seek to use their VA home-loan guaranty entitlement, we need to insure that it is readily available and sufficient to meet their needs. The dramatic doubling of the number of VA home loans closed last year—from about 103,400 loans during fiscal year 1982 to over 245,000 loans in fiscal year 1983—is evidence of the continuing popularity of and demand for the program. According to the President's fiscal year 1985 budget, 225,000 and 240,000 loans will be closed in fiscal years 1984 and 1985, respectively.

This legislation will help to insure that, to the extent interest rates and other economic factors generally make home purchases possible, the VA loan-guaranty program will continue to play the role that Congress intended of helping veterans become homeowners.

Mr. President, it is important to note that—as a result of a recommendation made by the President's private sector survey on cost control—the President's fiscal year 1985 budget indicates that, effective March 1, 1984, the VA would reverse its general policy of acquiring at forfeiture title to homes securing VA mortgage loans. Rather, the VA announced that it would respond to defaults by paying loan holders the guaranteed portion of the loan.

I was and am greatly concerned about any such policy change. When it was first brought to my attention in January, I wrote to Administrator Walters to urge that the VA take no action to implement any such policy change until after the Congress had had an opportunity to consider its consequences. Thus, I was pleased with the VA's decision on February 2 that it has delayed indefinitely the implementation of this change while it continues to study its effect on the program and the veterans it is intended to serve. At this point, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my January 18 letter to Administrator Walters be printed at the conclusion of my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, on January 18, 1984, I also wrote to the distinguished chairman of our Committee (Mr. SIMPSON) requesting that an oversight hearing be scheduled on the VA's home-loan guaranty program. I urged that three issues be covered in that hearing: The change in the policy with respect to acquiring titles to homes securing VA mortgages, the effect on the VA's program of negotiable interest rates now applicable to the FHA program, and the effectiveness of the VA's efforts to assist veterans who, as a result of becoming unemployed, have encountered difficulties in making mortgage payments on VA home loans. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this letter also be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, in addition to these three issues I have mentioned, I will urge that the committee also review the need for an increase in the home-loan guaranty maximum as proposed in the measure we are introducing today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the test of S. 2265 and the letters previously mentioned be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2265

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., January 18, 1984.

Hon. HARRY N. WALTERS,
Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Washington, D.C.

DEAR HARRY: The President of the Mortgage Bankers Associaton of America, Felix M. Beck, has recently contacted me to express their concerns arising from a recommendation made by the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control Task Force relating to the VA's home-loan guaranty program. Enclosed for your reference is a copy of Mr. Beck's December 15, 1983, letter to Chairman Simpson on this matter.

Specifically, his concern is that the VA might reverse its general policy of acquiring title to homes securing VA mortgage loans that have gone into default. Rather, it is feared, the VA will respond to defaults by paying loan holders the guaranteed portion of the loan, leaving the lender to dispose of the property. As pointed out in the letter, such a change in policy could have a far-reaching and harmful impact on many veterans attempting to utilize their entitlements under the VA's home-loan guaranty program.

Thus, I would appreciate your reviewing each of the points raised by Mr. Beck and letting me have your comments on them. In addition, I would urge that the VA take no action to implement any such policy change until after the Congress has had an opportunity to consider its consequences. In this regard, I have today written to Chairman Simpson requesting that oversight hearings on the VA's home-loan guaranty program be scheduled early in the forthcoming Session so as to permit the Committee to review this issue as well as other issues in the housing area.

Thank you for your attention to this matter. I look forward to hearing from you soon.

With warm regards,
Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

MORTGAGE BANKERS
ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
Washington, D.C., December 15, 1983.

Hon. ALAN K. SIMPSON,
Chairman, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The Administration is threatening to change the Veterans' Home Loan Guaranty Program in a significant and harmful way, by fiat, without Congressional direction and public discussion. While the exact time of implementation of this change is not definite, the Mortgage Bankers Association of America (MBA) is concerned that it is imminent. MBA respectfully urges you, as Chairman, and the other members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, to take appropriate action to prevent the Veterans Administration (VA) from abandoning an element of the VA loan guaranty program that has been used effectively for many years and that is important to the ability of veterans to own their own homes.

VA HOME LOAN GUARANTY PROGRAM

The VA home loan guaranty program was established by Congress as an entitlement program. Every veteran meeting the program's requirements should be entitled to the guaranty of his or her home mortgage, as provided by statute. Administrative implementation of the Task Force's proposal will restrict the program and reduce the availability of the home loan guaranty program to veterans who otherwise would be entitled to participate, but who would not be able to do so if the proposed administrative restrictions are put into effect. MBA urges Congress not to allow this administrative restriction of an entitlement program.

The VA home loan guaranty program is one the most successful housing programs in this Nation's history. Approximately 11 million veterans have been housed with VA-guaranteed loans. In fiscal year 1982, 92,930 new loans were guaranteed and in fiscal year 1983, the volume rose to 231,620. Mortgage bankers have always been heavily involved in the VA home loan guaranty program. During the last decade, mortgage bankers originated approximately 76 percent of all VA-guaranteed loans.

In order to encourage lender participation in the VA loan guaranty program, minimize administrative costs, and retain the flexibility to allow a derserving veteran to remain in the family home even after mortgage default, the VA has traditionally and wisely accepted title to the property in most foreclosure cases. Now, apparently under pressure from the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), the VA may refuse to acquire title to homes securing mortgages that have gone into default. Rather, the VA would respond to defaults by paying loan holders the guaranteed portion of the loan, leaving the lender to dispose of the property. This proposal, which originated with a Task Force of the President's Private Sector Survey on Costs, should be reviewed by your Committee and the Congress and not allowed to be implemented without that Congressional review.

PROBLEMS FOR LENDERS

If the VA accedes to the Task Force recommendation and no longer acquires properties, mortgage lenders will be forced to establish large scale real estate disposition operations, something that they are not now equipped to do. The VA's current practice of acquiring the vast majority of foreclosed properties allows the VA to spread its losses. The VA loses money on the disposition of some properties and breaks even or gains on the sale of others. Most mortgage lenders' operations are not sufficiently large to allows for the spreading of this risk. Lenders with large concentrations of properties in depressed areas would suffer devastating losses on the disposition of foreclosed properties in these areas.

Additionally, many small mortgage lenders who have issued Government National Mortgage Association (GNMA) mortgage-backed securities may not have the reserves that would be required to pay off security holders. These lenders could default on their obligations and go bankrupt.

IMPACT ON VETERANS

The shift of risk recommended by the Task Force and the resulting losses to the lending community must necessarily result in less opportunity for the veteran to obtain housing finance and in higher costs of borrowing for the veteran.

The Task Force recommendation would drastically curtail future interest on the part of lenders in investing in VA loans in the future. Those lenders willing to make VA loans would be forced to impose more stringent underwriting requirements on veteran borrowers. Many veterans who could qualify for financing under the VA's credit guidelines would be unable to satisfy the lender's necessary additional requirements. Currently, it is the VA's policies that determine which veterans qualify for financing. However, if the losses that result from borrowers' defaults are shifted to the lender, the policy for determining which veterans qualify for financing will be assumed by the private sector.

One of the most valuable benefits to the veteran of the VA home loan program is the unique no-down payment feature. A veteran may now buy a home with no-down payment, providing his or her income is sufficient to support payments; the VA program is, in fact, the only home mortgage lending program that carries a no-down payment feature. If lenders had to assume an increased risk on default, they would be unwilling to make a VA loan without the equity of a down payment.

If the VA abandons its tradition of accepting title to property, lenders will be forced to try to recover the added losses on VA foreclosures by increasing the discount points to the seller on new loan transactions. Interest rates on conventional and FHA mortgages float with the market and do not require as many discount points.

When the points required to compensate the lender for the recommended change in the VA's policy for acquiring properties are added to the points resulting from the administered VA interest rate, we fear that the veteran will be priced out of the market.

The VA home loan guaranty program should not be tampered with capriciously. Such a fundamental change, as is proposed, should be the subject of hearings before it is implemented, even though statutory authority now technically rests with the VA to make the change.

MBA urges that Congress act quickly to defer implementation of the Task Force recommendation until Congress has had an opportunity to investigate the possible adverse effects upon the veteran homebuyer. Please accept our appreciation for your courtesy in this matter.

Sincerely,

FELIX M. BECK.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., January 18, 1984.

Hon. ALAN K. SIMPSON,
Chairman,
Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR AL, I am writing to urge that you consider scheduling at the earliest convenient time in the forthcoming Session an oversight hearing on the VA's home-loan guaranty program.

As you know, the Committee has not had a hearing to focus on issues in this area since 1980. There are a number of matters that I believe the Committee should review and consider carefully. Specifically, I would hope that a hearing would focus on the recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control Task Force with respect to the VA's housing program, the effect on the VA's program of "negotiable" interest rates now applicable under the FHA program, and the VA's efforts to assist veterans who, as a result of becoming unemployed, have encountered difficulties in making mortgage payments on VA home loans. On the first two issues, I'm enclosing copies of my recent letters to Harry Walters that outline my concerns in more detail.

As always, Al, I'll appreciate your attention to this request.

With warm regards,

Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 2266. A bill to grant a Federal charter to the Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

VIETNAM VETERANS OF AMERICA

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member on the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I am today introducing S. 2266, a bill to grant a Federal charter to the Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc. Joining with me as cosponsors are the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee and a member of the Judiciary Committee (Mr. SIMPSON) and Senators RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, and DECONCINI.

The Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc.—VVA—is a national service organization devoted to the welfare of Vietnam-era veterans. Formed in 1978, VVA has grown into an organization with over 130 chapters stretching from New England to California, and its membership is over 16,000 strong.

Since it began, the VVA has addressed the major issues that face Vietnam veterans, including needs of readjustment, employment, and economic assistance, the adequacy of GI bill benefits, VA health-care programs, agent orange, and post-traumatic stress disorder. In the past several years, as it has become a truly national, representative organization, it has acted as a progressive catalyst on major legislative issues and has promoted the importance of recognizing Vietnam veterans as a valued and valuable national resource for America.

The members of VVA represent a wide spectrum of income levels, political beliefs, religions, professions, and ethnic groups. The VVA, through its State councils and local chapters, brings these different backgrounds and experiences together in order to seek to accomplish several purposes. One is to provide mechanisms through which Vietnam veterans can develop positive identification with their Vietnam service and with those who served with them. A second is to deal with the physical, psychological, and economic consequences of the war for individual veterans. A third is to seek to effect basic reform in the governmental and private institutions that have major impact on the lives of veterans.

The VVA is recognized by the VA under section 3402 of title 38, United States Code, to provide representation for veterans in connection with claims for benefits before the VA. The organization's claims service department has developed and distributed a comprehensive claims manual for use by its service officers and others involved in assisting Vietnam veterans.

The VVA has also been deeply involved in efforts to gain a better understanding of the psychological and other health-related problems of Vietnam veterans and to foster their readjustment to civilian life. It has joined in the fight to seek judicial review of VA decisions denying veterans' benefit claims. The organization has also contributed to efforts to promote employment opportunities for Vietnam veterans and to heighten recognition of the needs of women, minority group, and incarcerated Vietnam veterans.

As the local service providers, its 130 chapters serve as the most important component of the VVA. Each chapter sets its own goals to address the needs of its members and the community in which it operates. Each chapter has in common that they serve as the primary contact point for information and referral services; many have established local rap groups to help Vietnam veterans express their concerns and interests. They also operate other programs to meet the needs of Vietnam veterans, such as job fairs and substance abuse programs. Chapters also work to portray a positive image for Vietnam veterans in their communities by running such programs as Special Olympics, Big Brothers, and other community service projects.

Most importantly, Mr. President, the VVA works to enable Vietnam veterans to be proud of their time in the service in spite of the many controversies surrounding the war itself.

Mr. President, although the Vietnam Veterans of America has come a long way, there is a long way yet to go. VVA is moving constructively forward—in terms of the individuals who compose it, in terms of its organizational structure and processes, and in terms of the efforts of a generation of men and women who have already given so much to their country and who are continuing to give more.

Mr. President, the cosponsors of this bill and I believe that the granting of a Federal charter is an appropriate form of recognition for this group and should help promote its valuable ongoing work. I urge my colleagues to become acquainted with the organization and to join us in this initiative.

I also want to note that an identical measure is being introduced in the House today by the distinguished chairman and ranking minority member of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs, my good friends from Mississippi and Arkansas (Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT), as well as most other members of that committee. I am pleased that this initiative is being pursued, not only in both bodies of Congress, but with a real spirit of bipartisanship.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 2267. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase the maximum amount of the automobile assistance grant provided to certain severely, service-connected disabled veterans; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS' AUTOMOBILE ASSISTANCE ALLOWANCE INCREASE

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affiars, I am introducing S. 2267, a bill to provide a counterinflationary increase in the maximum amount of the automobile assistance allowance provided by the Veterans' Administration to veterans with certain severe service-connected disabilities. This bill would increase by 10 percent, the allowance from $4,400 to $4,840, effective October 1, 1984. Joining me as cosponsors are Senators RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, and DECONCINI.

The program of automobile assistance—now codified in chapter 39 of title 38, United States Code—was established by the Congress in Public Law 79-663, enacted in 1946. Under this program, veterans who have suffered the service-connected loss or loss of use of one or both feet, or one or both hands, or service-connected blindness are entitled to a one-time VA grant to assist them in purchasing an automobile. This is a most deserving category of veterans, and I believe all of my colleagues would agree that this benefit for them should not be permitted to be diminished over the years by the rising cost of a new car.

That was the position of the Congress in 1970 when it enacted Public Law 91-666, which I authored and which increased, effective January 11, 1971, from the original $1,600 to $2,800 the maximum amount of the allowance payable toward the purchase of an automobile or other conveyance. According to the Senate report accompanying the Senate version of that legislation—Senate Report No. 91-1232, page 14—the purpose of the 1971 increase was "to reestablish, to an effective degree, the comparability which originally existed between the cost of an automobile or other conveyance and the monetary assistance provided for its purchase."

In 1974, 1978, and 1981, increases—based on proposals I authored—were enacted into law by Public Laws 93-548, 95-479, and 97-66, respectively. Since the effective date of the last increase, October 1, 1981, the Bureau of Labor Statistics' Consumer Price Index component for new automobiles has risen by 6 percent. In addition, the CPI is projected to rise between 4 and 5 percent in fiscal year 1984.

Thus, Mr. President, the measure I am introducing today would increase the automobile allowance from $4,400 to $4,840—an increase of $440. This is a 10-percent increase, which would protect the value of this benefit from being eroded by inflation.

According to the VA, 963 veterans received automobile assistance allowances in fiscal year 1983 and the average benefit payment was $4,350. In fiscal years 1984 and 1985, it is estimated that 800 and 700 veterans, respectively, will receive this allowance and that the average benefit payment will be the maximum amount—$4,400—in each year. It should be noted that, based on the estimated number of awards in fiscal year 1985, our proposal to increase the allowance by $440 would result in very little increased cost—only $308,000 in that year.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of S. 2267 be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2267

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 1902(a) is amended by striking out "$4,400" and inserting in lieu thereof "$4,840".

(b) The amendment made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1984.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 2268. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to extend the authority for veterans readjustment appointments; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

EXTENSION OF VETERANS' READJUSTMENT APPOINTMENT AUTHORITY

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member on the Veterans' Affairs Committee, I am introducing today S. 2268, a bill to extend for 3 additional years the authority set forth in section 2014(b) of title 38, United States Code, for veterans readjustment appointments—VRA's. Joining with me as original cosponsors are Senators RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, and DECONCINI

The VRA authority, which would otherwise expire on September 30, 1984, permits certain disabled Vietnam-era veterans and educationally disadvantaged Vietnam-era veterans to be given excepted appointments in the Federal civil service. The purpose of the VRA authority is to assist these veterans by making it possible for them to be hired noncompetitively into the Federal civil service and to develop additional skills through a program combining education and training with the opportunity for a regular career appointment.

On March 26, 1970, President Nixon issued Executive Order No. 11521, which established a special civil service appointment authority for certain veterans and disabled veterans of the Vietnam era who were discharged after April 9, 1969. Under that original authority, the eligibility requirements specified that in order to be considered for an appointment a veteran must be qualified for the position, must have completed no more than 14 years of education, must have served on active duty during the Vietnam era, and generally must have been separated from the service for 1 year or less. Veterans who met these eligibility requirements could be given a VRA to any position in the competitive service at or below the general schedule 5—GS-5—level or its equivalent. A veteran who satisfactorily completed 2 years of substantially continuous service under a VRA and an education or training program was converted to career-conditional employment and automatically acquired a competitive status for civil service purposes.

In 1973, I authored legislation, based on this model, that was enacted in Public Law 93-508. It codified the VRA authority as section 2014(b) of title 38, extended the eligibility period for certain veterans who enrolled in a program of education within 1 year after release from active duty, and provided for the continuation of the program through June 30, 1978.

In connection with the Veterans' Program Extension Act of 1978, Public Law 95-520, I authored provisions—based upon legislation submitted by the administration—to extend the VRA program substantially. Section 6(b) of Public Law 95-520 extended eligibility to all Vietnam-era veterans with no more than 14 years of education, not just those separated after April 9, 1969, and eliminated the maximum limitation on the number of years of education for those Vietnam-era veterans with service-connected disabilities and those who were discharged or released because of a service-connected disability. In addition, the measure raised the grade-level limitation for VRA's from GS-5 to GS-7, expanded requirements for reporting on the use of this authority, and extended the program for 3 years through September 30, 1981.

In 1981, I authored provisions, enacted in Public Law 97-72, that further extended the authority through September 30, 1984.

Since the inception of this very successful program in 1970, VRA's have provided employment opportunities for more than 200,000 Vietnam-era veterans. However, it should be stressed that the VRA program does not provide for the creation of additional Government jobs. All VRA positions are regular civil service positions that count against an agency's staffing ceiling. Federal agencies' participation in the program is influenced by such factors as the agency's interest in providing eligible veterans with VRA opportunities, budgetary considerations, and the types of positions available that attract the interest and are compatible with the qualifications of VRA eligibles.

The July 1983 report on the VRA authority prepared by the Office of Personnel Management—OPM—pursuant to the statutory reporting requirements, indicates that the VRA authority continues to be of significant value in terms of assisting educationally disadvantaged and service-connected disabled Vietnam-era veterans in finding work. During the 6-month period from April through September 1982, the 12 executive departments and 9 independent agencies that participated in the program reported a total of 7,646 hires under the VRA authority—or about 3.5 percent of all new hires made by those 21 agencies during that period. Of these VRA appointments, 12 percent—or 919—were service-connected disabled veterans.

Well over one-half—or 56 percent—of the VRA appointments made during the April to September 1982 period were made by the Defense Department; the Army alone hired 2,371 using VRA's. The Veterans' Administration made 2,570 VRA hires—33.6 percent of all those hired agencywide during that period. Five other agencies' proportional representation of VRA hires among total new hires exceeded or equaled the government-wide proportion of 3.5 percent; these included the Navy, the Air Force, the Department of Justice, the International Boundary and Water Commission, and the Smithsonian Institution.

The success of the VRA program is also evidenced by the high government wide retention rates of veterans who were initially appointed under the VRA authority. OPM data indicate that of the 8,176 VRA hires who left the program in the April to September 1982 period, 7,092—or 86.7 percent—converted to career-conditional employment status in the civil service system.

Mr. President, the continued success and popularity of the program is without question. Indeed, at hearings held before the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs last September 29, there was unanimous support among the witnesses for extension of the program, including OPM Director Donald J. Devine, who noted that he supported enactment of legislation to extend the program through September 30, 1987.

It should be noted also that Director Devine testified in support of additional changes in the VRA authority including raising the maximum grade level, removing the education limit, and modifying the reporting requirements now set forth in section 2014(b). While I continue to study those recommendations carefully, I have not included them in this bill. I want first to get some measure of the impact that such changes would have on the purpose of the VRA program to assist disadvantaged and disabled Vietnam-era veterans and how such changes would relate to carrying out effectively other programs and policies of the Federal Government to employ our Nation's veterans as well as other citizens.

Mr. President, the VRA program has provided employment for tens of thousands of those Vietnam-era veterans who would otherwise, because of a variety of factors, have not been able to obtain Federal employment. The extension of the basic authority would insure that the program continues to meet those needs.

I ask unanimous consent that the test of the measure be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2268

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 2014(b)(2) of title 38, United States Code, is amended by striking out "1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "1987".

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 2269. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to improve various aspects of Veterans Administration health-care programs and to provide eligibility to new categories of persons for readjustment counseling from the Veterans' Administration; and to require the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the Secretaries of Defense and of Health and Human Services to submit a report on alternatives for providing Federal benefits, and services to individuals who, as civilians, provided services to U.S. Armed Forces in Vietnam during the Vietnam era; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HEALTH-CARE PROGRAM IMPROVEMENTS ACT OF 1984

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am today introducing for myself and Senators RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, and DECONCINI: S. 2269, the proposed Veterans' Administration Health-Care Program Improvements Act of 1984. This measure addresses a variety of issues relating primarily to Veterans' Administration health-care services. Its basic underlying purpose is the continued improvement of the VA's ability to meet the needs of our Nation's veterans and their dependents. The VA, as the principal Federal agency with responsibility for providing for our veterans and their survivors, must be given the legislative authorities it needs in these rapidly changing times in order to carry out its mission fully and effectively. Our bill is directed toward that end.

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS

Mr. President, the eight substantive provisions of our bill would:

First, expand the definition of the Vietnam era for the purposes of title 38, United States Code, so as to include service in Vietnam at any time during the period beginning on July 8, 1959 and ending on August 4, 1964, the day before the starting date of the Vietnam era in current law.

Second, in cases in which a veteran's family members have been receiving counseling or mental health services from the VA in connection with the veteran's care or counseling, authorize the VA to continue to provide services to those family members for a period of up to 6 months following the veteran's death.

Third, provide persons still on active duty in the Armed Forces who served during the Vietnam era with eligibility for VA readjustment counseling and authorize the Administrator of Veterans Affairs to provide such eligibility to persons who served in the Armed Forces after the Vietnam era in combat-like situations.

Fourth, make permanent the VA's current, pilot-program authority to place veterans with alcohol or drug abuse dependencies or disabilities in non-VA halfway houses and other community-based programs for treatment and rehabilitation.

Fifth, provide the Administrator with new authority to increase rates of pay, for recruitment and retention purposes, for protective services employees at VA health-care facilities.

Sixth, modify the due date of a recurring Comptroller General's report on the Director of the Office of Management and Budget's compliance with certain statutory requirements relating to funded personnel ceilings for the VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery.

Seventh, require the Administrator to develop criteria pursuant to which applications for grants for the construction, remodeling, expansion, or alteration of State veterans' home facilities can be awarded on a basis other than first-come, first-served.

Eighth, direct the Administrator and the Secretaries of Defense and of Health and Human Services to submit to the Congress a joint report setting forth and evaluating various alternative approaches pursuant to which the Federal Government might provide benefits, services, and assistance relating to disabilities that possibly result from certain aspects of service in Vietnam—such as exposure to agent orange or to particularly traumatic events—in individuals who were present there during the Vietnam era as civilian employees of the Federal Government or of organizations that provided significant assistance to U.S. Forces, such as the American Red Cross or the USO.

VIETNAM-ERA VETERANS READJUSTMENT COUNSELING PROGRAM

Mr. President, the VA's program for providing readjustment counseling to Vietnam-era veterans, which was initially authorized in 1979, continues to be the most important and effective Government program for assisting those Vietnam-era veterans who have experienced readjustment difficulties since their service. Although there are some problems in the operation of the program—most notably in the fee-for-service portion—I am satisfied that this program, now operating out of 135 Vet centers, is very successful. Last year, in Public Law 98-160, the program as it is presently constituted was given a 4-year extension, until September 30, 1988. This extension should provide sufficient long-term stability for the program to permit appropriate management improvements to be made. With reference to the fee-for-service portion of the program, I ask unanimous consent that a recent exchange of letters that I had with the VA—my December 9, 1983, letter to the VA's Chief Medical Director, Dr. Donald Custis, and Dr. Custis' January 20, 1984, letter in response—be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., December 9, 1983.

Dr. DONALD L. CUSTIS,
Chief Medical Director, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DON, as you know, I have had an ongoing interest in the status of the contract between the Veterans' Administration and Swords to Plowshares for the provision of readjustment counseling. In this connection, I recently had the opportunity to review the October 28, 1983, opinion of the General Counsel regarding the payment of certain sums under that contract. That opinion includes the following statement:

[W]e hope that the confusion and difficulty encountered in connection with the administration of this contract will demonstrate the need for a complete review and evaluation of all contracts now outstanding to provide readjustment counseling, as well as a new awareness within the VA of the need for improved contract management and oversight.

I agree wholeheartedly about the need for a "complete review and evaluation of all contracts" and for "improved contract management and oversight", and urge your prompt consideration of these actions.

In view of the problems that have come to light regarding the administration of these contracts, I believe it is vitally important at this time that all existing contracts be reviewed to determine which services are being provided and to which veterans. It is even more important that the agency, as soon as possible, decide how best to monitor the fee/contract program in the future and then commit the resources necessary—including the personnel needed—to carry out that task.

As successful as the readjustment counseling program has generally been through the Vet Centers in helping a great many Vietnam-era veterans and their families deal more effectively with post-war readjustment difficulties, questions about the fee-basis portion of the program have persisted from that program's inception. They have now reached a point where, unless satisfactorily resolved, they threaten to undermine the reputation of and support for the entire program.

In a May 17, 1982, letter to me, you stated that "the Readjustment Counseling Service is addressing itself to developing a mechanism for monitoring the [fee/contract] program as to consistency, quality, and cost-effectiveness." The current controversy surrounding the Swords to Plowshares contract and numerous reports of similar situations involving other contracts as to which inadequate monitoring of contractors is also alleged would seem to be compelling evidence that the efforts described as being underway eighteen months ago have yet to be successful.

In carrying out the review and evaluation called for by the General Counsel, I believe that the agency should, at a minimum, address the following questions:

(1) A. Should the monitoring of contracts for readjustment counseling remain with the Readjustment Counseling Service or should some other office in the agency (e.g., the Office of Procurement and Supply) be given this responsibility?

B. If the actual monitoring function is shifted, should the Readjustment Counseling Service remain responsible for providing technical assistance (i.e., orientation, education, and training assistance) to contractors?

(2) In view of the answers to question 1, how many additional FTEE are needed for contract monitoring and how many for technical assistance purposes and where should the personnel be located?

(3) What should the general qualifications be for individuals in such positions and should they have prior experience with the Vet Center program?

With respect to question 1, I believe there is very strong reason for retaining this responsibility in the Readjustment Counseling Service field locations where the actual counseling experience and the knowledge of local veterans and conditions is so abundant. Also, the very great need for the performance of this technical assistance function for many contractors without extensive Vietnam veteran readjustment counseling experience raises two related questions: Whether the amount of technical assistance required suggests that too many resources are currently being allocated to contract services? Would not it enhance the program if some of these resources were used to expand in-house efforts over which the agency can exercise greater quality control?

With respect to question 2 regarding the number of FTEE needed, I note that, when the responsibility was initially given to the Readjustment Counseling Service to monitor contractors and to provide technical assistance, no additional personnel were assigned to the Vet Center program to carry out these new tasks. This created many situations around the country in which Vet Center personnel were forced, to the detriment of the overall program, to choose between carrying out the new responsibilities and fulfilling their other duties. For example, I have been advised that the Seattle, Washington, Vet Center team leader, in addition to his team leader responsibilities, was assigned monitoring and technical assistance responsibilities with respect to contractors who are located over a wide geographic area and to whom the VA might pay out over $300,000 in one year for counseling services. Plainly, it is not possible for one person to carry out effectively such multiple responsibilities.

Thus, if the agency should decide that either the monitoring or the technical assistance responsibility, or both, should remain with the Vet Center program, I believe that it is vital that additional personnel be assigned for such purpose or purposes. (One suggestion that might be considered in the event of such a decision would be to employ former Vet Center personnel—particularly those who have been involved in direct counseling but who need some relief from the stress of that role—to work with fee/contract providers.)

On a related matter, you will recall that we exchanged a number of letters last year and earlier this year that addressed, among other issues, the agency's projection for using fiscal year 1983 readjustment counseling monies for fee-basis contracts. In that correspondence and in other ways, I repeatedly urged that steps be taken to avoid spending for non-readjustment counseling purposes any of the funds that the agency had identified as intended but which were not needed for the fee/contract program. I deeply regret that this result was not avoided; indeed, it is doubly regrettable that the purpose of these expenditures bears no direct relationship whatsoever to Veitnam-era veterans.

As I did last year, I strongly urge that the agency estimate—as soon as possible—the approximate amount that will be expended in the current fiscal year on the fee/contract portion of the program. To the extent that that amount is less than the $11 million that the agency has noted, in response to questions following our Committee's February 16, 1983, hearing on the FY 1984 budget, were to be devoted to such purpose, the agency should promptly determine and thereafter advise the Appropriations and Veterans' Affairs Committees in both Houses how it proposes to utilize the balance of those earmarked funds. I very much hope you will move forward on this suggestion immediately.

Don, I deeply appreciate your continuing cooperation and assistance and your attention to this particular matter. I look forward to receiving your response to this letter as soon as possible, and would greatly appreciate your addressing specifically each of the points discussed above.

With warm regards,
Cordially,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member.

VETERANS ADMINISTRATION,
DEPARTMENT OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY,
Washington, D.C., January 20, 1984.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Veterans' Affairs, United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CRANSTON: Thank you for your letter of December 9, 1983 concerning the readjustment counseling program and the management of the fees/contract program.

DM&S Circular 10-83-100, A-123 Internal Control Systems, identifies certain areas as being highly vulnerable to fraud, waste, and abuse. Within the readjustment counseling program, we are concerned about the performance of contractors providing counseling services. An internal control review of the fees/contract program was originally scheduled to be conducted in May 1984. We decided to accelerate that timetable. A task force was formed in mid-October to examine various aspects of the contracts program in accordance with the guidelines set forth in the circular cited above. This task force is chaired by Mr. Albert B. Washko, Director of the Albany, New York, VA Medical Center, and is working closely with the Office of Procurement and Supply, Medical Administration Service and Readjustment Counseling Service in Central Office. Their goal is to identify potential problems involving the fees/contract program at the field and VA Central Office levels; developing a format for review of internal controls; and making recommendations to improve the management and monitoring of this $11.2 million program.

Immediately following the completion of the first quarter, we shall be reviewing our current obligations for the fees/contract program and making an estimate for total fiscal year 1984 expenditures. I shall provide this figure to you once it is available.

In addition, we are now studying the possibility of contracting out for some monitoring of the contracts program. I shall be pleased to keep you informed of our initiatives in that area.

Your suggestions and concerns for the readjustment counseling program are appreciated.

Sincerely,

DONALD L. CUSTIS, M.D.,
Chief Medical Director.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, under current law, section 612A of title 38, eligibility for readjustment counseling services is limited to veterans of the Vietnam era and in certain circumstances, their family members.

The measure we are introducing today would make four changes in the law to expand the list of those eligible for such services.

First, individuals who served during the Vietnam era but who are still on active duty—and thus not veterans under the applicable title 38, United States Code, definition—would be made eligible for readjustment counseling. Although I am aware of no data suggesting an unmet counseling need among large numbers of active-duty personnel, I have heard from a number of individuals working in the program about requests for help from active-duty personnel. In any event, I do not believe that any individual who served in the Armed Forces during the Vietnam era and feels a need for readjustment counseling should be barred from eligibility simply because he or she is still on active duty. Section 4 of the bill would remove that bar.

Second, by virtue of an amendment to the definition of "Vietnam-era" in section 101(29) of title 38, United States Code, our bill would provide eligibility to certain veterans who served in Vietnam before the beginning of the Vietnam era. Under current law, the Vietnam era is defined as the period beginning on August 5, 1964, and ending on May 7, 1975. The starting date coincides with the Gulf of Tonkin resolution, which was unquestionably a watershed event in the history of U.S. involvement in Vietnam. However, there were many U.S. troops in Vietnam prior to that date and, as shown by the Vietnam Veterans Memorial on the Mall here in Washington, D.C.—on which the first person listed died from hostile fire in 1959—these service personnel were under combat conditions well prior to 1964.

Mr. President, there are a number of practical difficulties in setting fixed dates for a period of hostilities, such as the Vietnam era, and I note that there were a variety of responses to this proposal to modify the starting date of the Vietnam era when it was before the committee in S. 11 last year. Nevertheless, I do not believe that it is appropriate to continue to tell those individuals who were exposed to armed hostilities in Vietnam prior to August 1964 that they are not veterans of a period of war. Thus, section 2 of the bill would amend title 38 to provide that for those veterans who served in Vietnam, the Vietnam era begins on July 8, 1959—the date the first U.S. military personnel were killed by enemy action in Vietnam. In addition to providing eligibility for readjustment counseling to those who served in Vietnam between that date and August 5, 1964, this change would provide them with general eligibility for certain other needs-based VA benefits, as well as employment assistance.

Mr. President, in selecting the date of July 8, 1959, as the beginning date for the Vietnam era, I note that I am aware of other dates that could be used. For example, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, in testimony last year on S. 11, suggested the date of July 1, 1958, the beginning date for award of the Armed Forces Expeditionary Medal for service in Vietnam. Also, section 1440 of title 8, United States Code, relating to the naturalization of aliens through active-duty service during periods of military hostilities, uses February 28, 1961, as the beginning of hostilities in Vietnam. Third, the Congressional Charter of the American Legon, which is set forth in section 45 of title 36, United States Code, uses the date of December 22, 1961, the date of the first direct combat-related death of a member of the Military Advisory Command Vietnam, to begin the Vietnam era. Cogent arguments can be made for any of these dates or others, and I hope that the committee will pursue this issue further this year.

Third, section 4 of the bill would provide for expanding the period of service that makes an individual eligible for readjustment counseling to include certain service after May 7, 1975, the end of the Vietnam era. Thus, the Administrator would be authorized to specify service during periods of time and in specific locations in which U.S. Armed Forces were under hostile fire as qualifying service for readjustment counseling purposes. This provision recognizes that members of our Armed Forces are at times exposed to situations short of declared war—such as exist in Beirut at present or on Grenada during the invasion of that island last year—that might produce the need for readjustment counseling after their service. I want to stress my view that this authority, if enacted, should be used by the Administrator, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense, only in very limited circumstances in which our service personnel actually experience combatlike situations.

Mr. President, a final provision in the measure in section 3 relates to eligibility for readjustment counseling assistance. Under current law, the VA may provide mental health counseling and certain other services to the family members of a veteran when doing so is necessary for the effective treatment of the veteran. This authority is availabile in the readjustment counseling program for the provision of services to the family of a veteran who is receiving readjustment counseling. All indications that I have received regarding the use of this family counseling authority in conjunction with readjustment counseling are that it has been of great importance in the agency's efforts to assist Vietnam-era veterans in need of readjustment assistance. Recently, however, I have become aware of situations in which veterans who were receiving readjustment counseling from the VA together with their family members have died—some, tragically, by suicide—leaving family members in perhaps greater need of assistance at the very time that, because of the veteran's death, they lost their eligibility for such assistance.

Moreover, receiving bereavement counseling from someone with whom the family member has already developed a supportive relationship will often be the most valuable way for that dependent to receive such counseling. We are proposing to amend current law so as to authorize the VA to continue, for up to 6 months following the veteran's death, to furnish appropriate mental health assistance to family members who were receiving it before the death of the veteran.

COUNSELING TO FAMILIES IN CONNECTION WITH HOSPICE AND OTHER CARE ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. President, the change I have just described would be made to section 601 (6) of title 38, which provides the general authority, under specified, limited circumstances, for counseling, mental health, and other services for a veteran's family members. Thus, the bill would authorize the continuation of services to the veteran's family in situations other than the readjustment counseling program in which family members are receiving services in connection with a veteran's care. One such area where this new eligibility could be of particular use would be in cases in which the VA is providing health care to an eligible veteran suffering from a terminal disease, such as in 1 of the VA's 16 experimental hospice programs. An appropriate, integral part of a program of hospice care is counseling for family members after the patient's death, and enactment of this provision would provide a clear statutory basis for the VA's furnishing care.

STUDY OF CIVILIANS WHO SERVED IN VIETNAM

Mr. President, in addition to the provisions that I have just outlined, which bear a relationship to veterans who served in the Vietnam conflict, a provision in the measure we are introducing is related to those individuals who served in Vietnam as civilians, either as Government employees or as employees of organizations that provided significant assistance to our Armed Forces. Major examples are the American Red Cross and the USO.

Under this provision, section 9 of the bill, the VA Administrator, in conjunction with the Secretaries of Defense and Health and Human Services, would be required, within 180 days after the date of enactment of this measure, to submit a report to the Congress advising on how the Federal Government might respond to the needs of those individuals for problems related to their work in Vietnam, such as for health problems that might be related to their exposure to dioxin from agent orange or to particularly stressful combat situations.

Mr. President, I am concerned that there may be significant numbers of individuals who made important contributions to the U.S. effort in Vietnam but who, because of their nonmilitary or non-Federal status during that period, may not now have access to adequate assistance—or access to any assistance at all—from the Federal Government for problems that might be related to their work in Vietnam. I believe that, particularly in those cases in which the Federal Government may be responsible for their condition, there is an obligation on the Government to provide appropriate redress. The report that would be mandated by this provision would be an important step toward providing some guidance on how to resolve this matter.

CONTRACT PROGRAM FOR DRUG/ALCOHOL TREATMENT

Mr. President, section 5 of the bill would amend section 620A of title 38, which provides authority pursuant to which the VA may contract with various community facilities to provide care and treatment to veterans suffering from alcohol or drug dependence or abuse disabilities, to change that authority from a pilot program to a permanent authority.

The pilot program authority—which I authored—was enacted in 1979 in Public Law 96-22 and is scheduled to expire on September 30, 1985. Pursuant to section 620A(f) of title 38, the Administrator is required to submit a report by March 31 of this year on the operations of the pilot program through September 30, 1983. I am looking forward to that report and expect that the results of that report will play an important role as the committee considers this legislation to make the pilot program authority permanent.

Although the VA's formal report on this program is not yet due and therefore no systematic evaluation of the program is yet available all of the evidence that I have reviewed—including reactions from veterans who have been placed in halfway houses and other community-based facilities, VA employees who work with veterans with drug or alcohol abuse dependencies, and individuals associated with various community-based drug and alcohol treatment programs—indicates that the pilot program has been quite successful in enabling significant numbers of veterans to receive appropriate and helpful assistance.

PROTECTIVE SERVICES EMPLOYEES

Mr. President, in recent years, the VA has experienced significant difficulties in attracting and retaining security personnel at numerous health-care facilities around the country. This problem, which has been particularly acute at some of the larger VA medical centers located in urban areas, has had a detrimental impact on the level of security at many VA facilities and has also affected the morale of the security personnel. Although many factors have been suggested as causes of this problem, the point raised most frequently involves the level of pay available for such personnel. The common complaint that is voiced is that many individuals will work as VA security personnel only long enough to gain sufficient experience to enable them to be hired elsewhere in police or security jobs for higher pay.

In an effort to address this problem section 6 of the bill we are introducing today would give the Administrator of Veterans Affairs new authority to increase rates of pay—including minimum, intermediate, or maximum rates—for protective services personnel and to do so on a nationwide, local, or other geographic basis as appropriate. Having this authority, which would be subject to Presidential disapproval for 90 days before any such increased rate could go into effect, should provide the VA with an important new tool with which to address these difficult recruitment and retention problems. Thus, for recruitment and retention purposes, this provision would treat security personnel the same as certain VA direct health-care personnel.

GRANTS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF STATE HOME FACILITIES

Mr. President, under title 38, the VA participates in two separate programs of assistance to State veterans' homes—one, a program of per diem payments to the homes for care provided to eligible veterans and, the other, a program of matching grants to the States for the construction, remodeling, or renovation of State veterans' homes.

The State home program is a vital adjunct to the VA's overall efforts, both now and in the coming years and decades, to meet the health-care needs of older veterans, and I strongly support the overall program. During the first session of this Congress, I was pleased to introduce legislation—S. 629 which was cosponsored by my colleagues on the committee, Senators RANDOLPH and SPECTER—that was ultimately enacted with modifications in section 105 of Public Law 98-160. This program provided for substantial increases in the State home per diem rates.

In this session, I am pleased to note that the VA, as part of the agency's fiscal year 1985 budget submission, is requesting a significant increase over the fiscal year 1984 appropriations level—from $18 million to $34.5 million—for the construction grant program. Although I have some questions about a few of the details of the agency's plans for spending those funds, I anticipate being able to support this request fully.

To improve the effectiveness of this matching fund program, a provision in our bill would make a technical amendment to section 5035 of title 38. It is the VA's view that, under current law, the funding of otherwise qualifying grant applications must be provided on a first-come, first-served basis. A policy or practice of funding all qualifying applications in the order in which they were received does provide assurance that there will be no undue favoritism in choosing among such applications. However, unwavering adherence to that one principle makes it impossible to take into account substantive factors relating to the increased effectiveness of the program.

Although I am not convinced that the law requires such grant applications to be funded in the order received, I am satisfied that the VA does not intend to change this practice without legislation expressly authorizing it to do so. Because the dollar value of qualified grant applications already submitted to the VA exceeds the funds now available to it and requested for fiscal year 1985 and because the agency should be able to integrate its funding decisions in this program with other decisions regarding utilization of resources to meet the current and projected demand for nursing home and domiciliary care, I believe current law should be amended to give the VA flexibility in choosing among qualified grants. Thus, section 8 of the bill would amend section 5035 of title 38 to require the Administrator to issue regulations setting forth criteria by which grant applications would be rated and, then, in any year in which the value of approvable grants exceeds the funds appropriated for such purposes, to award such grants in accordance with the priority assigned. The priority would be required to take into account, among other things, the demand on the VA for nursing home and domiciliary care—the types of care which State homes are particularly well equipped to provide—in the geographic area concerned and the extent to which it is feasible and desirable to meet that demand through various VA authorities.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, as I noted at the outset, the diverse provisions of this bill have as a general unifying purpose bringing about the continued improvement of the Veterans' Administration's ability to meet the needs of our Nation's veterans and their dependents. I look forward to working on this measure with the committee chairman, my good friend from Wyoming (Mr. SIMPSON), the cosponsors of the bill, and other members of the committee, the VA, the veterans' service organizations, and others interested in legislation affecting veterans.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of S. 2269 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. INOUYE):

S.J. Res. 227. Joint resolution designating the week beginning November 11, 1984, as "National Women Veterans Recognition Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL WOMEN VETERANS RECOGNITION WEEK

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am delighted today to be introducing, on behalf of myself and Senators SIMPSON, RANDOLPH, MATSUNAGA, DECONCINI and INOUYE, Senate Joint Resolution 227 a measure to designate the week beginning November 11, 1984, as "National Women Veterans Recognition Week".

Despite the fact that many women have served bravely and well in the Armed Forces—there are at present 1.15 million women veterans—their service in the military has largely been ignored. As a consequence, for far too long they neither received the public recognition and thanks they deserved nor, in many instances, were made aware of the many benefits available to them from the Federal Government because of their service.

In 1982, the General Accounting Office issued a report—GAO HRD 82-98—on an important study that had been requested by my good friend from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) on the VA's efforts to provide health care services to women veterans. Although the GAO report focused directly only on medical benefits for women veterans, its findings highlighted the fact that many women veterans were unaware of the veterans' benefits available to them and that there were many shortcomings in the VA's efforts to locate and contact women veterans and to meet their needs for benefits and services.

Since that GAO report, there have been a number of important steps that have led to a new awareness of the contributions of women veterans. Most prominent was the establishment of a VA Advisory Committee on Women Veterans, first on an administrative basis last year by the Administrator of Veterans Affairs, Harry N. Walters, and in November 1983 by law with the enactment of Public Law 98-160. The Advisory Committee has had a fruitful initial meeting and will meet for a second time this month. I am very gratified by the Advisory Committee's work to date and believe that it will make many important contributions in the months and years ahead as it identifies problem areas in the Federal Government's response to women veterans and recommends appropriate solutions.

Another area relating to women veterans in which important steps have been taken involves access to VA health care. The VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery has issued several directives to its facilities across the country in order to try to insure that all VA health-care facilities are aware of women veterans' health-care needs and are prepared to meet them. In addition, in Public Law 98-160, the Congress enacted legislation I proposed directing the VA to "insure that each VA health-care facility is able * * * to provide appropriate care, in a timely fashion, for any gender-specific disability * * * of a woman veteran * * *." I hope that these steps result in meaningful progress toward correcting the problems identified by the GAO.

Despite these important strides on behalf of women veterans, a concern lingers that far too many citizens remain unaware of the contributions that women veterans have made to our Nation. It is for this reason that we are proposing that the week beginning on Veterans' Day this year be designated as "National Women Veterans Recognition Week". Our goal is to provide a fitting and proper focus on the many contributions of women veterans over the years. Such a week, with appropriate ceremonies and events, should help bring these patriotic women into public view and gain for them the recognition they so richly deserve.

I look forward to working with my good friends, the chairman (Mr. THURMOND) and ranking minority member (Mr. BIDEN) of the Judiciary Committee, as well as my other colleagues on that committee as they consider this measure. I am particularly delighted that two of my colleagues on the Veterans' Affairs Committee who also serve on the Judiciary Committee, Senators SIMPSON and DECONCINI are joining as cosponsors. I invite all my colleagues to join with us and the other cosponsors of this measure and help insure its quick enactment so as to allow sufficient time for advance publicity so that maximum awareness about National Women Veterans Recognition Week can be created among the public.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 93—COMMEMORATING THE DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE OF VICTIMS OF THE HOLOCAUST

Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. DOLE, and Mr. PELL) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. CON. RES. 93

Whereas pursuant to the Act entitled "An Act to establish the United States Holocaust Memorial Council", approved October 7, 1980 (94 Stat. 1547), the United States Holocaust Memorial Council is directed to provide for appropriate ways for the Nation to commemorate the Days of Remembrance of Victims of the Holocaust, as an annual, national, civic commemoration of the Holocaust, and to encourage and sponsor appropriate observances of such Days of Remembrance throughout the United States;

Whereas pursuant to such Act, the United States Holocaust Memorial Council has designated April 29, 1984 through May 6, 1984, as "Days of Remembrance of Victims of the Holocaust"; and

Whereas the United States Holocaust Memorial Council has recommended that a one-hour ceremony he held at noon on April 30, 1984, consisting of speeches, readings, and musical presentations as part of the Days of Remembrance activities: Now, therefore, be it—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Rotunda of the United States Capitol is hereby authorized to be used on April 30, 1984, from ten o'clock ante meridiem until three o'clock post meridiem for a ceremony as part of the commemoration of the Days of Remembrance of Victims of the Holocaust. Physical preparations for the conduct of the ceremony shall be carried out in accordance with such conditions as may be prescribed by the Architect of the Capitol.

DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased today to introduce a concurrent resolution authorizing the use of the Capitol Rotunda on April 30, 1984, for a ceremony commemorating the Days of Remembrance of Victims of the Holocaust. I do so as a member of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council and am joined by Senators BOSCHWITZ, DANFORTH, DOLE, and PELL, who are also Council members.

The Holocaust Memorial Council has designated April 29 through May 6, 1984, as "Days of Remembrance of Victims of the Holocaust" in accordance with the intent of the Congress in establishing the Council in 1980. As a member of the Council and as a member of the President's Commission on the Holocaust before 1980, I can envision no other location for such a ceremony that better signifies the commitment of the American people that the Holocaust will not be forgotten.

The Holocaust Memorial Council has recommended a program of speeches, readings, and musical presentations on April 30. These events will be part of our effort to insure that generations to come neither forget, nor grow indifferent to the death, dehumanization, the courage, and the faith that surrounded European Jewry four decades ago.

Sigmund Strochlitz and Benjamin Meed, Cochairmen of the Council's Days of Remembrance Committee, report that planning for commemorations throughout the Nation is well advanced. Some 45 Governors, nearly 100 mayors and 25 State legislatures already have begun working with Council staff in planning civic commemorations in communities and on campuses across the country. The National Commemoration in the Capitol Rotunda will give these days a truly national focus.

Congressman BILL GREEN is introducing a similar concurrent resolution in the House of Representatives today along with House Members of the Holocaust Memorial Council, Congressmen GARCIA, LEHMAN, SOLARZ, and YATES. It is our hope that both the House and the Senate will give prompt approval to the use of our Capitol Rotunda for so compelling a ceremony.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

OFFICE OF DIRECTOR OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL DRUG OPERATIONS AND POLICY

THURMOND AMENDMENT NO. 2700

Mr. SIMPSON (for Mr. THURMOND) proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 1787) to establish an Office of the Director of National and International Drug Operations and Policy; as follows:

On page 1, strike out line 3 and all that follows through line 20 on page 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following: That this Act may be cited as the "National Narcotics Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby makes the following findings:

(1) The flow of illegal narcotics into the United States is a major and growing problem.

(2) The problem of illegal drug activity falls across the entire spectrum of Federal activities both nationally and internationally.

(3) Illegal drug trafficking is estimated by the General Accounting Office to be an $80,000,000,000 per annum industry in the United States.

(4) The annual consumption of drugs has reached epidemic proportions.

(5) Despite the efforts of the United States Government and other nations, the mechanisms for smuggling opium and other hard drugs into the United States remain virtually intact and United States agencies estimate that they are able to interdict no more than 5 to 15 percent of all hard drugs flowing into the country.

(6) Such significant indicators of the drug problem as drug-related deaths, emergency room visits, hospital admissions due to drug-related incidents, and addiction rates are soaring.

(7) Increased drug trafficking is strongly linked to violent, addiction-related crime and recent studies have shown that over 90 percent of heroin users rely upon criminal activity as a means of income.

(8) Much of the drug trafficking is handled by syndicates, a situation which results in increased violence and criminal activity because of the competitive struggle for control of the domestic drug market.

(9) Controlling the supply of illicit drugs is a key to reducing the crime epidemic confronting every region of the country.

(10) The magnitude and scope of the problem requires the establishment of a National Drug Enforcement Policy Board, chaired by the Attorney General, to facilitate coordination of all Federal efforts by relevant agencies.

(11) Such a Board must have responsibility for coordinating the operations of Federal agencies involved in attacking this problem through the development of policy and resources, so that a unified and efficient effort can be undertaken.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to insure—

(1) the maintenance of a national and international effort against illegal drugs;

(2) that the activities of the Federal agencies involved are fully coordinated; and

(3) that a single, competent, and responsible high-level Board of the United States Government, chaired by the Attorney General, will be charged with this responsibility of coordinating United States policy with respect to national and international drug law enforcement.

SEC. 3. There is established in the executive branch of the Government a Board to be known as the "National Drug Enforcement Policy Board" (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Board"). There shall be at the head of the Board a Chairman who shall be the Attorney General (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Chairman"). In addition to the Chairman, the Board shall be comprised of the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Defense, Transportation, Health and Human Services, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget and the Director of Central Intelligence and such other officials as may be appointed by the President. Decisions made by the Board pursuant to section 4(a) of this Act shall be acknowledged by each member thereof in writing.

SEC. 4. (b) For the purpose of coordinating the activities of the several departments and agencies with responsibility for drug law enforcement and implementing the determinations of the Board, it shall be the duty of the Chairman

(1) to advise the Board in matters concerning drug law enforcement;

(2) to make recommendations to the Board for the coordination of drug enforcement activities;

(3) to correlate and evaluate intelligence and other information on drug law enforcement to support the activities of the Board;

(4) to act as primary adviser to the President and Congress on national and international illegal drug law enforcement programs and policies developed by the Board under subsection (a) of this section and the implementation thereof; and

(5) to perform such other duties as the President may direct.

(a) The Board shall facilitate coordination of United States operations and policy on illegal drug law enforcement. In the furtherance of that responsibility, the Board shall have the responsibility, and is authorized to—

(1) review, evaluate and develop United States Government policy, strategy and resources with respect to illegal drug law enforcement efforts, including budgetary priorities and a National and International Drug Law Enforcement Strategy;

(2) facilitate coordination of all United States Government efforts to halt national and international trafficking in illegal drugs; and

(3) coordinate the collection and evaluation of information necessary to implement United States policy with respect to illegal drug law enforcement.

(c) In carrying out responsibilities under this section, the Chairman, on behalf of the Board is authorized to—

(1) direct, with the concurrence of the head of the agency employing such personnel, the assignment of government personnel within the United States Government in order to implement United States policy with respect to illegal drug law enforcement;

(2) provide guidance in the implementation and maintenance of policy, strategy and resources developed under subsection (a) of this section;

(3) review and approve the reprogramming of funds relating to budgetary priorities developed under subsection (a) of this section;

(4) procure temporary and intermittent services under section 3109(b) of title 5 of the United States Code, but at rates for individuals not to exceed the daily equivalent of the maximum annual rate of basic pay payable for the grade of GS-18 of the General Schedule;

(5) accept and use donations of property from all government agencies; and

(6) use the mails in the same manner as any other department or agency of the executive branch.

(d) Notwithstanding the authority granted in subsection (a) of this section, the Board shall not interfere with routine law enforcement or intelligence decisions of any agency.

(e) The Administrator of the General Services Administration shall provide to the Board on a reimbursable basis such administrative support services as the Chairman may request.

SEC. 5. The Chairman shall submit to the Congress, within nine months after enactment of this Act, and biannually thereafter, a full and complete report reflecting United States policy with respect to illegal drug law enforcement, plans proposed for the implementation of such policy, and, commencing with the submission of the second report, a full and complete report reflecting accomplishments with respect to the United States policy and plans theretofore submitted to the Congress.

SEC. 6. Title II of the Drug Abuse Prevention, Treatment and Rehabilitation Act (21 U.S.C. 1112) is amended by adding at the end of section 201 (21 U.S.C. 1111) a new subsection (d) as follows:

"(d) Support to National Drug Enforcement Policy Board. One of the duties of the White House Office of Drug Abuse Policy shall be to insure coordination between the National Drug Enforcement Policy Board and the health issues associated with drug abuse.

SEC. 7. This Act shall be effective January 20, 1985.

Amend the title to read as follows: "To establish a National Drug Enforcement Policy Board.".

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

WHO CARES ABOUT DEFICITS?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, Mr. Marvin Stone, the eminent editor of U.S. News & World Report, has written one of the best pieces on the deficits that has been my pleasure to read.

It is so well done that I think all Members of Congress should read it because, in my humble opinion, it tells the truth, the whole truth, and while it may be hard to swallow, we better get ready to do what he suggests, or we are in trouble.

I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

WHO CARES ABOUT DEFICITS?

(By Marvin Stone)

Our cover story this week tells the bad news: We are in for another whopping budget deficit, one that probably will hit 200 billion dollars before the last cent is spent.

And our overall national debt—it's racing toward 2 trillion dollars.

Doesn't anyone care? Well, it turns out that while sophisticated economists and politicians in Washington gnaw at the pros and cons, people out there do care. The article below reflects the agony we see in much of our mail and in editorials in other parts of the country.

BY ROGER CLAWSON

The Billings (Mont.) Gazette

America is suffering a hemorrhage of debt, and the two men best able to stanch that wound are avowed enemies.

The story of federal deficits draining the strength of our nation is now a familiar one.

With 1.4 trillion dollars in debt, the government is spending 200 billion dollars more than it receives each year.

The government borrows the difference, taking half the cash available for loans of any kind. Interest rates soar. Industrial growth slows. Unemployment rises. Home buyers are priced out of the market. Loggers are laid off. The chain reaction seems to have no end.

Ronald Reagan campaigned against Jimmy Carter's 60-billion-dollar annual deficits.

Now, Reagan is sending budgets to Congress asking for 200-billion-dollar annual deficits.

The supply siders' grand plan for recovery has proven to be not worth the bar napkin on which the Laffer curve was first drawn. The Kemp-Roth tax cut [was estimate to] trim federal revenues by 750 billion dollars over five years.

Supply siders claimed that taxpayers given a break would save their money, making it available for industrial growth.

It hasn't worked. Savings have actually decreased. Meanwhile, the U.S. * * * balance-of-trade deficit is growing.

The solution is not to be found in Republican supply-side magic. Nor does it lurk in a revised Democratic New Deal.

The solution is painful, but it lies within the grasp of two men, two men from opposite sides of the political spectrum—Ronald Reagan and Thomas "Tip" O'Neill.

The President and the Democratic leader of the House are two stubborn men, men married to opposing ideologies.

Both want the deficit reduced.

O'Neill is ready to raise taxes and cut defense spending but not to cut domestic spending.

Reagan opposes a tax increase, demands increases in defense spending, but is eager to cut domestic spending.

But the deadlock need not be. The two archfoes could become history's heroes without compromising their principles. The crisis is too great and too grave to admit partisan squabbles. There is blame enough to go around and work for all willing hands.

All areas must be attacked.

Not even Reagan can defend Pentagon contracts that allow a manufacturer to charge the military $200 for a 49-cent wrench.

Not even O'Neill can justify Social Security payments to millionaires.

But no recent American President has ever been in a better position to wage peace aggressively and trim the need for military buildup than the superhawk Ronald Reagan. He, more than anyone else, should want the military machine that is his pride to be efficient.

And few liberals have ever had the political strength to insist that social services must be adequate but rigorously policed for waste. O'Neill has a chance, perhaps a vanishing opportunity, to save this nation's social conscience from fiscal catastrophe.* * *

If the two most powerful party leaders do not bury the hatchet, they could bury the country.

But there is an alternative. They could be remembered as the great adversaries who delivered their nation from adversity.●

S. 1285—EDUCATION AND ECONOMIC SECURITY ACT

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on May 11, the Committee on Labor and Human Resources reported S. 1285, the Education for Economic Security Act, as an original bill. It was the product of a major cooperative effort within the committee that is focused primarily on improving the subject and teaching skills of working mathematics and science teachers.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE TENNESSEE INTERCOLLEGIATE STATE LEGISLATURE

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I would like to take a few minutes to acquaint my colleagues with an outstanding organization of college students in my State, the Tennessee Intercollegiate State Legislature.

For nearly 20 years, this group has conducted an annual statewide general assembly to give representatives of Tennessee's 250,000 college students a chance to discuss State affairs and express the opinions of college students on major issues. In that time, thousands have participated in the program and have become more familiar with the operations and problems of State government.

TISL is particularly notable because it is not an arm of any college or governmental entity. It is an independent, not-for-profit corporation founded and managed by the students themselves. At each general assembly, officers are elected to administer the organization for the coming year. They have complete responsibility for the organization's financial and administrative affairs, and they manage them in a most laudable manner.

While we were in recess during December, TISL completed its first statewide fundraising campaign. Many of our State's most important businesses made substantial donations, including Hospital Corporation of America, First American Bank, US Bank, South Central Bell, Lillard's Pharmacy, Third National Bank, and Bone & Woods, attorneys. Esquire Magazine, which is based in New York, also made a major contribution. So, Mr. President, not only are we fortunate to have an outstanding organization such as the Tennessee Intercollegiate State Legislature, but we are fortunate to have farsighted business leaders willing to support such a fine organization.

TISL officials have asked me to serve as honorary cochairman for the 1984 fundraising campaign, and I am looking forward to serving in this capacity.

It is important to attract this Nation's most promising young people into government, and organizations like the Tennessee Intercollegiate State Legislature help in this regard. I look forward to helping this organization in my State, and I hope my colleagues will be supportive of similar organizations in their States.●

THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT AND ABORTION

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I recently received a letter from law professor Lynn Wardle of Brigham Young University on the subject of the connection between the equal rights amendment and abortion. I am asking that it be placed in the RECORD, because I think it will give my colleagues who insist there is no such connection something to think about while making such claims.

For my own part, I am suspicious of the fact that those who claim there is no connection are the same people who strenuously resist amending the proposed amendment to say so. As Lincoln Oliphant of the Senate Republican Policy Committee put it in a recent article:

> Doubt is all too natural when proponents of a measure refuse to spell out what they aver is there implicity. If an exception is really there, sub silentio, why not remove all doubt by writing it down? (National Review, June 24, 1983.)

In a matter of this importance, it is simply not enough to wait and "let the courts decide." As Professor Wardle states:

> For a member of Congress to pass the buck to the courts in this instance would not only be a crude political act, but would constitute deserting a constitutional post in a time of crisis.

He quotes Justice Harlan's comment that:

> Legislatures are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts.

Mr. President, I strongly recommend this letter to the Senate, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

OREM, UTAH
January 16, 1983.

Hon. Jake Garn,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR GARN: In recent weeks I have read in several publications that certain lawyers, law professors, and political officials have expressed their opinion that the Equal Rights Amendment, as presently worded, has nothing to do with abortion. Several of them have suggested that if the ERA were enacted it would have no effect upon the legality or funding of abortion.

As you know, I am a Professor of Law at Brigham Young University and I have devoted considerable time to studying and writing about constitutional issues relating to abortion. The potential impact of the ERA on abortion is a subject of great professional and personal interest to me. For that reason, I am writing this letter to you to express my personal opinion about what impact passage of the ERA, as presently worded, would have on the constitutional issues of abortion restriction and funding.

In my opinion, passage of the ERA unquestionably could set in constitutional concrete the judicially-created doctrine of abortion-on-demand and could result in mandatory public funding for nontherapeutic abortions. While I do not believe that it would be necessary or desirable to interpret the ERA in that manner, yet if the ERA is passed in its present form those are predictable consequences.

Offhand, I can think of three separate lines of argument by which the ERA, in its present form, could be construed by the courts in a radically pro-abortion manner.

First, any restrictions on abortion or abortion funding could be held to violate the ERA as unlawful discrimination against women. Obviously restrictions on abortion and abortion funding impact more directly upon women than men since only women can become pregnant. And while discrimination on the basis of pregnancy has been held not to violate the Fourteenth Amendment, we must remember that the purpose of the ERA is to outlaw much of the sex-impacting discrimination that is allowed under the Fourteenth Amendment (i.e., it is because the Fourteenth Amendment does not go far enough to prohibit certain types of discrimination that impact upon one sex that the ERA is being pushed). Thus, it would not be unexpected for the Supreme Court to hold that pregnancy-related restrictions violate the ERA. And since several members of the Court have already expressed the opinion that abortion is just another method of "treating" pregnancy, it would seem logical for the Court to hold that laws discriminating against any particular method of "treating" a pregnancy (i.e., abortion restrictions or abortion funding restrictions) impermissibly discriminate against women and violate the ERA.

Second, passage of the ERA while the doctrine of abortion-on-demand established in Roe v. Wade and its progeny is in full flower could be seen as evidence of the intent to legitimate and crystalize through an express constitutional amendment the abortion decisions. When the ERA was proposed by Congress the first time, the Supreme Court had not yet decided Roe or declared its radical abortion doctrine. Abortion was still prohibited or restricted in all 50 states and the District of Columbia. But now, the legal landscape has changed dramatically. The Supreme Court has ruled practically all abortion restrictions unconstitutional. We have been told that the Constitution implicitly guarantees the right to abortion-on-demand as created in Roe, the right of married women to obtain abortions without spousal consent as declared in Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, the right of minors to get abortions without parental consent as established in Planned Parenthood and Bellotti, the right of abortionists to perform abortions without disclosing the facts of fetal development as declared in Akron, etc. In view of present status quo in abortion law, it would be extremely dangerous to pass the ERA without some clear, authoritative, congressional repudiation of the abortion decisions. In the absence of any explicit negation of the current abortion doctrine, it would be easy for the Court to hold that the right of abortion privacy, in all of its excessive and repugnant manifestations, has been tacitly incorporated within the ERA, and that attempts to restrict or regulate abortion violate the ERA.

Finally, the obvious susceptivity of the ERA to pro-abortion interpretations has been raised in hearings held in both houses of congress by serious constitutional scholars, respected legal experts, and knowledgeable members of congress. It is undeniable that congress is aware that the ERA in its present form could be interpreted in a definitely pro-abortion manner. Many of the most prominent and vocal supporters of the ERA, both in and out of congress, are outspoken advocates of "reproductive freedom," i.e., abortion-on-demand and publicly funded abortion. Thus, passage of the ERA in its present form, without any clear and explicity congressional action to prevent a pro-abortion interpretation, would signify at least a lack of congressional intent that the ERA not be interpreted to set in concrete the right to abortion-on-demand, and could be seen as evidence of a tacit congressional intent that the ERA should be so interpreted.

In light of these three separate grounds for interpreting the ERA so as to secure the right to abortion-on-demand and even abortion funding, I believe that it is irresponsible for anyone to give assurances that the ERA could not be given a strongly pro-abortion interpretation. Remember, if it is passed and ratified, the ERA will be interpreted by the same department (the Supreme Court) which was able to interpret the Constitution so as to give us Roe v. Wade, Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, Colautti v. Franklin, Akron, etc., even without an amendment written and promoted by the advocates of greater abortion rights.

Those who oppose congressional action to clarify this matter by arguing that the ERA has nothing to do with abortion are irresponsible in another way as well. We must not forget that "legislatures are ultimate guardians of the liberties and welfare of the people in quite as great a degree as the courts." Missouri K. & T. R. Co. v. May, 194 U.S. 267,270 (1904) (Harlan, J.). Indeed, the task of amending the constitution is specifically and exclusively vested by the Constitution in the legislative (or convention) branches of the federal and state governments—not the judicial branch or the legislative branch. It is a nondelegable constitutional responsibility. For members of congress to refuse to address serious questions about the meaning and intent of a proposed Amendment to the Constitution, to merely shrug their shoulders as if to say "we'll let the courts worry about that," is a serious breach of trust. For a member of congress to pass the buck to the courts in this instance would not only be a crude political act but would constitute deserting a constitutional post in a time of crisis.

Regardless of how one feels about the proposed ERA or about the doctrine of abortion-on-demand, it would seem incumbant upon all persons of good faith to insist that congress honestly perform its constitutional obligation to the people of this country and squarely address this hard question. This could be done by adding brief clarifying language to the test of the proposed ERA, by adding clarifying language to the enabling act or the Resolution embodying the ERA, or even by including an explicit, unequivocal statement in a relevant committee report, especially if that language were brought to the attention of all members of congress in such a fashion as to elicit their clear assent when they vote for the ERA.

Finally, it is worth noting that for nearly a century the Utah Constitution has given women full political and legal equality. Article IV,§1 of our state Constitution reads:

"The rights of citizens of the State of Utah to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. Both male and female citizens of this State shall enjoy equally all civil, political and religious rights and privileges."

Note that on its face this provision of the Utah Constitution appears to be as open-ended and unrestricted as the ERA. Why, then, do many people in Utah have such a mistrust of the ERA?

I believe that the answer to that question has to do with the fact that Utah's commitment to equal rights arises from its belief in the equal worth under law of all human beings—a value which not only makes sex discrimination unacceptable but which makes abortion an abhorent practice. Moreover, the failure of the supporters of the ERA to accept reasonable proposed constructions or clarifications of the proposed amendment, such as the Sensenbrenner proposal, and their refusal to repudiate radical interpretations does not inspire confidence in reasonable men and women. The Utah equal rights provision was enacted at a time and in a context that launched it on a course of reasonable and careful application. The Utah state courts, likewise, have been faithful to their role as interpreters and have given it a reasonable construction. By way of contrast, the radicalism of many ERA supporters and the unrestrained judicial activism of the federal courts, especially pertaining to abortion, threaten fundamental values and institutions that Utahans hold sacred.

Thus, I hope that you will do all you can to insist that the ERA is officially and explicitly clarified by Congress when it comes up for consideration. For regardless of one's opinion about advisability of the ERA or its potential effect on abortion and other important legal issues, the only responsible course is for Congress to squarely and directly face those issues before voting on the ERA.

Very truly yours,

LYNN D. WARDLE.●

IN MEMORY OF ROBERT E. WEINTRAUB

● Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, last year the Congress and the Nation lost a great public servant with the death of Dr. Robert E. Weintraub, senior economist for the Joint Economic Committee.

Recently, his dear friend and a great economist in his own right, Dr. David Meiselman, gave a moving tribute to Bob at a conference on international monetary issues dedicated to his memory. I would like to submit Dave's remarks to the RECORD for the benefit of all those who knew and appreciated Bob's many years of service to the Congress.

The remarks follow:

IN MEMORY OF ROBERT E. WEINTRAUB

(By David I. Meiselman) [1]

It is difficult to speak with you this evening in memory of our dear friend and colleague, Bob Weintraub—especially in words appropriate to his life, his spirit, his uniqueness, his accomplishments and the void that has been left by his untimely death.

Bob was so close to so much of my own life for so long, since we were both graduate students as the University of Chicago more than 30 years ago, that, as life goes on, I find it difficult to believe that Bob is no longer with us. Yet, like many of you, I am reminded of Bob almost every day.

For years we saw each other frequently and we spoke almost daily, as Bob, with some puzzle and dismay, would tell me about the latest monetary statistics and the most recent Federal Reserve rationalization why they were doing the best possible and much better than an ungrateful, wayward country deserved, or new research results or an old idea that took on new and richer meaning, or Bob's struggle to convert good economics and an understanding of and a dedication to free markets and political liberty into effective and acceptable legislation, or Bob's great joy and pleasure he shared with his wife Sue at a family celebration, a visit with one of their children, an afternoon at the racetrack, an evening at the theater, or a trip to Europe, or Bob's outrage and disappointment at craven or misguided behavior and attitudes in and out of government, or his counsel, sometimes on the money, sometimes not, about the bond market or commodity futures, or about discussing and sharing so much in our working and personal lives.

For Bob, there was no clear distinction between his work and the rest of his life, a reflection of the fact that he was such a whole, such an integrated, such a complete person, what his forebears would call a mensch. He represented so well what, in another age would have been proudly labeled as the republican (small r) virtues of a good citizen of the republic, the virtues of wisdom, of prudence, of generosity, of learning, of compassion, of responsibility, of fidelity—and for Bob an extra portion of fun and zest.

It is a great tribute to this country and to the American system of liberty that a man like Bob Weintraub was able to achieve so much and in so doing to contribute so much to the rest of us. Bob grew up in the Bronx and attended public schools, all under quite ordinary circumstances for the time and place. His parents were not far removed in time from the Pale of eastern European Jewry. His father was a small businessman in the garment industry, first as a traveling salesman selling dresses. Later he opened a small dress shop in New York City. Bob's two brothers went into different businesses.

Bob started college at Williams College, and he and Williams chose each other almost by accident. Bob was surprised that he ever went to Williams, and Williams must have been surprised at having a freshman like him, with his gutsy street smarts that characterized Bob all through his life. He started college in the first year of our direct involvement in World War II. Like so many other college students, Bob signed up in the Navy V-12 program. At the end of his freshman year Bob was called to active duty and was sent to a V-12 unit at Dartmouth. After a heated dispute with one of his instructors, Bob left Dartmouth and became a Marine infantryman.

Bob spent the rest of the war in the South Pacific, landing and fighting with Marine amphibious and infantry units of the Marine Third Division on their bloody road from Guadalcanal to Iwo Jima. It was typical of Bob that, against the odds, he survived both the fighting itself and the bitterness and hatred that war breeds that poison the lives of victors as well as vanquished. I recall speaking with Bob after a trip to Japan he and Sue took a few years ago that he enjoyed immensely. He told me of the pleasure and the special interest he found in his contacts with the Japanese people. I knew some of Bob's war experiences and how deeply he felt about them, so I asked how he felt about Japan and the Japanese people in light of all the suffering, death and destruction he had personally experienced. Bob turned to me and wisely said that war is essentially impersonal, that when it was over it had best be over, and that it serves no useful purpose to dote on old wrongs and old wounds. He was a fighter, he did not forget, but he was not a prisoner of old battles once the battle was over, one reason he was able to work so successfully on Capitol Hill.

After the war Bob returned to Williams, received his B.A. in 1948, and then went on to graduate school at the University of Chicago. At Chicago he started serious study of economics, but like many of us returning veterans, he had no immediate or career goal of becoming either a professor or a professional economist. Also, like most of us, he started out not much different from the conventional New Deal liberal statist that dominated American universities at that time. It was Milton Friedman and the rest of the University of Chicago that shook him up and opened his eyes and his mind to the virtues and problems of free markets and free men. Although Bob later went on to achieve deserved fame for his studies in the field of monetary economics, he first specialized in labor economics. His Ph. D. dissertation, "The Productive Capacity of Rural and Urban Labor," was summarized in an article in "The Journal of Political Economy." To help gather material for his research, and to help gather money to live on, Bob worked in the Ford assembly plant in South Chicago.

Bob's first professional job was at the National Bureau of Economic Research in New York where, under the direction of Al Reese, he worked with Donald Jacobs, now Dean of the Graduate School of Management at Northwestern University, on re-estimating the Consumer Price Index for the early years of this century. Their research showed that the old estimates were in error and that the correctly measured price index was significantly lower than originally estimated. Among other things, the revised price statistics eliminated an apparent earlier puzzle why, in spite of substantial economic growth in the aggregate, there was little or no measured growth of real wages in the U.S. in the decade or so before World War I.

Bob continued in the labor economics area. He taught at Northwestern for a year before spending a decade, from the mid-fifties to the mid-sixties, teaching at City College of New York where he had an unusually large number of outstanding students such as Sam Peltzman, Bette Mahoney, Dave O'Neil and Alan Fechter. He wrote papers on wages, unemployment and labor productivity, as well as one of the first modern attempts since Malthus to apply rigorous economic analysis to the analysis of birth rates and population.

Bob entered the field of monetary economics, almost by accident. I believe that I have some responsibility for that, and to some extent so does Allan Meltzer.

In 1963 Wright Patman finally attained the Chairmanship of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives. One of his first acts was to initiate an extensive study of the Federal Reserve, the first such Congressional study in the then fifty year history of the Federal Reserve. He turned to Allan Meltzer for help in setting up and staffing the study. I was then at the Treasury working for Paul Volcker, which pleased neither of us. Allan suggested that Patman hire me to help initiate the study. Soon after, Bob was also hired to spend two days a week working for the Banking Committee while he continued teaching at City College. Five or six months later I left the Banking Committee to teach at Johns Hopkins. Bob assumed more and more responsibility for the Federal Reserve study, and became its senior author and supervisor. The extensive hearings and the study as a whole, especially the pathbreaking paper by Karl Brunner and Allan Meltzer, made an important contribution to lifting some of the mystery surrounding the process, the content and the effects of monetary policies, and to initiating the application of positive economics to the analysis of how the Fed, in fact, carried out its monetary policy requirements.

Even after Bob moved to the West Coast to teach at the University of California, Santa Barbara, he maintained contacts with the Banking Committee as he started to write extensively in his new field of monetary economics, including a well received college text. In 1973, he was asked to return to the House Banking Committee on a full-time basis as Senior Economist with primary staff responsibility for monetary policy questions but involved also with other Banking Committee concerns.

For the next decade, Bob mainly worked on Capitol Hill. For a brief period in 1975 he left the House Banking Committee for the Treasury where he was chiefly involved in the New York City financial crisis. The experience left Bob even more skeptical about the feasibility and merit to government bailouts and interventions in financial and other markets. On this score I recall Bob's telling me about the time he had phoned William Isaac, Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to congratulate him because, after the failure of the Penn Square Bank, the F.D.I.C. had agreed to guarantee only those deposits it had insured rather than, as the F.D.I.C. had usually done, bailing out all of the deposits and depositors.

Bob then returned to Capitol Hill and became Senior Economist for the Senate Banking Committee. (He later returned to the House Banking Committee before shifting to the Joint Economic Committee staff.)

For some years Bob had been aware of the serious damage done by discretionary Federal Reserve policies, by money growth that was too high, leading to inflation, by unstable money growth, that was the primary cause of short-period economic instability, and by the costly and maddening consequences of the avoidable uncertainty surrounding the conduct of monetary policy and the growth of money, itself. Bob was also convinced that, as in the 1930's, much of the explosive growth of government was a response to many of the consequences of poor monetary policy, and that little progress could be made in taming Leviathan until there was either a marked improvement in Fed performance under current arrangements or the adoption of a better set of monetary arrangements. As if still more evidence was needed, Bob would point to the inability of the Reagan Administration to shrink government, or even to slow its growth significantly, once the Fed induced recession started in mid-1981, six months after the new administration took office.

To improve the management of monetary policy that would be acceptable to the Congress, which has the constitutional authority over monetary policy and the Federal Reserve, Bob developed the idea of monetary targets, requiring that the Federal Reserve present to Congress a plan for M-1 growth for the next year linked to a procedure for what he believed would be effective Congressional oversight.

In March 1975 Congress passed House Concurrent Resolution 133 which required that the Fed report targets for money growth and then to report to Congress on the achievement of those targets. Bob, and many others, were optimistic that the targets would be a significant step towards the achievement of noninflationary, steady and predictable money growth. Even though Congress did not mandate specific numerical targets of money growth, Congress did require that the Fed adopt a target, and the sense of the Congress was that the Federal Reserve would then take seriously hitting the target. Bob, and by Bob's account to me, such Capitol Hill veterans as Senator Proxmire, one of the supporters of the targets, never considered that the Fed would attempt to flout the intent of Congress and then succeed in doing so. Although Bob had a keen sense of Capitol Hill realities, it also came as a great and unpleasant surprise and a bitter disappointment that Congress, itself, would be so unmoved and unresponsive when the Federal Reserve, first under Arthur Burns, then under Paul Volcker, turned the targets exercise into a disgraceful sham.

Bob felt deeply about the utter failure of the monetary targets he had fathered and the fact that, after all the research, after all of the conferences, after all of the Congressional hearings, and after the legislation, itself, there had been essentially no improvement in Federal Reserve performance or in Federal Reserve accountability for their actions, and on Capitol Hill there had been little or no change in the long standing failure of Congress to monitor the Fed effectively or to exercise its Constitutional responsibility for monetary policy. In recent years Bob would often repeat Mike Hamburger's rhetorical question about the absence of significant structural change and the economic policies of both the Federal Reserve and the Reagan Administration when Mike noted, "How can you expect things to be different when nothing has changed."

Many times we discussed the fact, especially disquieting to students of Milton Friedman, that knowledge itself is rarely enough to insure better public policies. We came to understand that rules determine, or at least fundamentally shape, results. Therefore, to achieve better results it was necessary to use knowledge to shape effective rules. Although Bob was generally a confirmed and cockeyed optimist, his optimism did not extend to the future conduct or results of monetary policy under current arrangements, and until his death five months ago he continued to do research on workable monetary rules mandated by law.

During the years on the Hill, Bob was always engaged in serious economic research, mainly in monetary economics, in addition to the applied economics he practiced as a Congressional staff economist and counselor. In this decade alone his work resulted in more than 30 publications. To the best of my knowledge, among the hundreds of Congressional staffers Bob's research and publications were unique. His contributions have an important place in the growing body of research and analysis about the economic and political role of money and the conduct of monetary policy. I briefly note his research, now cited so widely, on the lagged connections between money and prices and on the political economy of Fed policies.

I note also Bob's imaginative plan presented to the Gold Commission in 1981 to restore the gold certificate reserve requirement as a means for achieving slow and stable money growth. Unfortunately, it failed to convince the Commission. It was not pure enough for the gold bugs, who also had other agendas; it was too threatening for supporters of the current flawed monetary arrangements. There are also the two studies he completed in the past year, "International Debt, Crisis and Challenge: and "International Lending by U.S. Banks: Practices, Problems and Policies" which, in my judgement, place in proper perspective the serious international debt problems that you are discussing at this conference.

And, during most of this decade Bob continued to teach in Virginia Tech's Graduate Economics Program in Northern Virginia to the delight of a new generation of grateful students.

But Bob's lengthy and impressive bibliography does not adequately reflect his unique role on the Hill, in Washington and in the economics profession. In a city much given to sham and to shameless self-serving abuse of the public trust and the powers of government, and in an area of economics and economic policy much given to illusion and profound ignorance, Bob consistently added an unusual note of unfailing dedication as well as refreshing candor and realism.

Yet, he was able to work with a wide range of people of differing political and economic persuasions and affiliations without compromising his own intellectual integrity and his dedication to liberty and the rule of law—even in the conduct of monetary policy. His advice, counsel and strong shoulders were widely sought out and frequently employed. Some of the results of his work contained, in part, in the Monetary Control Act of 1980, are now seen in the systematic deregulation of the banking system and financial markets.

So, while we join Sue, their five children and the Weintraub family in mourning Bob's untimely death, both for their loss and ours, and as we try to understand better what shaped this man, we cannot help but celebrate the roots and the system that made possible such a full, vital and memorable life that sets such a good example and standard for all of us and for our children. We thank God for Bob Weintraub's life and we are grateful for the many blessings Bob Weintraub bestowed upon us and upon the country he loved, whose essence he understood and which he always served with uncommon fidelity.●

BRIG. GEN. GEORGE H. CATE, JR.

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise to recognize a distinguished American, a Tennessee volunteer, Brig. Gen. George H. Cate, Jr., of Nashville, Tenn.

General Cate's exemplary career began in June 1952, in Nashville, where he enlisted as a first lieutenant. His steady rise through the ranks brought him the star he deserves, and the command over 38,000 troops.

His is the only brigade designated to handle and care for prisoners of war. Their expertise, dedication, competence and high level of training they owe to their commander, General Cate.

In connection with this tribute, Mr. President, may I take this opportunity to salute the Reserve units of the Armed Forces all over this land. They represent the Nation's preparedness for war in its never-ending quest for peace. Nowhere is the spirit of the Reserves better exemplified than in the 290th Military Police Brigade.

Mr. President, I extend my sincere congratulations, with deep respect, to my friend General Cate. We wish him our best in his well-deserved retirement from an illustrious military career.●

FRANK PERATROVICH

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, Alaska is celebrating its 25th anniversary as a State this year and is honoring those whose efforts were instrumental in the drive to achieve statehood. I would like to take a few moments of my colleagues' time to comment on the contributions of Frank Peratrovich to the State of Alaska.

A major force in Alaska's push for statehood, Frank Peratrovich died on January 4, 1983, at the age of 88, just hours after he was awarded an Alaska Statehood Founder's Medallion. Participating in Alaska politics for over 30 years, Frank Peratrovich served in the territorial house of representatives and later in the State senate. He was also one of the 55 elected delegates who helped write the Alaska State Constitution. He was the only Native delegate and was vice president of the Alaska Constitutional Convention.

His contributions were not limited to politics. He was active in union organizing as well. He helped found the Purse Seiners' Union.

Born in the village of Klawock in southeast Alaska, he returned there after college and helped his family run the local general store which was his primary business interest throughout his life. He served as mayor of Klawock for 20 years.

Frank Peratrovich has many personal achievements and we Alaskans are the beneficiaries of those achievements. However, Alaskans not only benefited from Frank Peratrovich's role as a public servant, they benefited even more by simply knowing him. He was a warm, kind person. My father and Frank Peratrovich were friends—a friendship which was valued by all members of our families. To have shared the friendship of Frank Peratrovich was the rare opportunity to have shared something very special. He was indeed a unique person, who was loved and respected by all who had the privilege to know him.

I am glad to have had the opportunity to reflect upon the life of this great Alaskan and thank the Senate for the time.●

SALUTE TO SAN DIEGO'S BOB TEAZE

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, an outstanding public servant is retiring after 25 years with the city government of my hometown, San Diego. Bob Teaze retires as assistant city attorney on February 9, and I can attest by my own personal experience that the city of San Diego will greatly miss his expertise.

During the 11 years that I served as San Diego's mayor, I came to know Bob well as I saw him at work, and as I benefited from his legal advice. Bob has served the city attorney's office and the citizens of San Diego with pride and unfailing integrity. For all of that, I would like to thank Bob and to wish him all the best in his new life.

Mr. President, I submit for the record an article from the San Diego Union by Michael Smolens, and request it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the San Diego Union, Dec. 26, 1983]

OFFICIALS PRAISE ROBERT TEAZE

(By Michael Smolens)

Bob Teaze is a living history book upon which city attorneys have relied for years for snap reference checks.

Teaze, San Diego's assistant city attorney, intends to leave Feb. 9—25 years to the day when he first began prosecuting misdemeanors for the city. As he climbed the ladder through the department, Teaze accumulated some offbeat stories to tell, accomplishments to relish and nuggets of valuable information to dispense.

"The singular characteristic we'll probably miss the most professionally around here is his memory," said City Attorney John Witt. "He has been the repository of historical information about city government in general and our office in particular.

"He is absolutely amazing."

Teaze, 58, graciously and predictably dismisses such praise. "My memory is not what it once was," he said, adding that Witt has been in the department almost as long as he has, "so my historical value may not be that great."

Witt, however, will not be contradicted.

"It's handy to have someone like that around," he said. "I can't remember what I had for breakfast."

Teaze's retirement will carry a semi designation for a while. He plans to hang his own shingle and blend his municipal law background with his expertise on Japan and knowledge of Japanese firms—a talent that he could rarely use while working with the city.

Striking out into the private sector was something Teaze always planned to do. In fact, his is one of those bizarre stories that might best begin with the line, "A funny thing happened to me on the way to . . ."

In his letter of resignation, Teaze told Witt that when be first signed on as a deputy city attorney in 1959, "I had the intention of staying a year or so and then going out into the private practice of law."

But one position led to another and now, a quarter of a century later, the man with the crusty veneer—but whom Witt says has a heart of gold—finally will do what be originally set out to do.

"It's been great," Teaze said. "I've participated in just about every major case, major issue that has confronted this office over the last 23 or 24 years."

Teaze's low-key demeanor belies his globetrotting early years. While with the military and the State Department he was stationed in such exotic locales as London, Hong Kong, Saigon, Hanoi and Tokyo—his place of birth.

The son of an oil company executive who worked in Japan until World War II loomed perilously close, Teaze moved to San Diego with his family in 1940. He attended Point Loma High School but ultimately transferred to and graduated from Deerfield Academy in Massachusetts.

Then it was on to Dartmouth, where in 1943 he met a good-sized classmate and football player named Edwin Miller Jr., now better known as San Diego County's district attorney.

Teaze's college studies were suspended by the war. He was drafted by the Army, which put him in an intensive eight-hour-a-day Japanese language program. He was to be a translator and interrogator near the front lines, but the war ended before be obtained such an assignment. So Teaze was sent to Tokyo with the occupation forces and collected Japanese documents which he later helped catalog for the Library of Congress.

He returned to Dartmouth and graduated in 1949. Within a year, he was hired as a code clerk by the State Department and was sent to Saigon just when, in Teaze's words, "the French were starting to get hit hard by what was then called the Viet Minh" (predecessors to the Viet Cong). Teaze had made several trips to Hanoi during that time.

From there it was on to Hong Kong and then to Tokyo, where Teaze became an investigator, checking out the backgrounds of people who applied for State Department jobs. He eventually was assigned to London, where he became assistant security officer. It was there that a significant event in the history of Robert Stewart Teaze took place.

"I got married to my one and only wife—Pat," he said.

Teaze eventually went to the Hastings School of Law in San Francisco, graduated in 1958, passed the bar and headed to San Diego to look for a job. There were no openings at the city, but then-City Attorney Jean DuPaul interviewed Teaze and remembered that his mother—who grew up in San Diego—was quite a tennis player in her day.

"That probably had something to do with him choosing me" when a position opened up, Teaze said with a grin.

There were 15 attorneys in the department at the time, now there are nearly 60. Teaze kept putting off his foray into private practice because he kept moving up. He was assigned to the civil division, became chief deputy attorney and, in September 1966, was promoted to assistant city attorney. Teaze finally acknowledged that his employment with the city could not be classified as temporary.

"I guess then I became a permanent figure," he said.

His favorite case involved a Pueblo land boundary dispute which he lost and appealed. During the interim, he was able to reach a settlement that was favorable for the city. Teaze said he worked nearly three years on the case.

His favorite story deals with his unsuccessful prosecution of a sailor who had been charged with manslaughter after a fatal car accident. Teaze said he wanted the jury polled and, as that was occurring, the wife and brother of the victim charged toward the defendant. Amid the courtroom chaos the judge fumed that the polling of the jury forced the commotion.

"You're the cause of this, Teaze!" he told the city's prosecutor.

When things appeared to settle down, the attorneys were called to the bench to hash out the matter with the judge. Suddenly, the defendant was seen from a courtroom window dashing across the street with the victim's brother in hot pursuit. The brother chased the sailor around the block a couple of times, caught him and began to have at him when a couple of sheriff's deputies arrived, and dragged the brother away.

"We didn't notice he (the defendant) was gone" from the courtoom, Teaze said, laughing.

To many, Teaze is known more for being something of a grouch than a jokester and story teller.

Witt described Teaze's criticism of work done improperly as "merciless."

"He scares people to death until they get to know him," Witt said.

Teaze and his wife plan a trip to the British Isles after leaving the city attorney's office. He then hopes to return and set up practice in San Diego, which he says " is one of the finest places to live in the world."

"It gives you some satisfaction knowing you've been with the city 25 years helping to maintain that," Teaze said.●

NOTICE OF DETERMINATIONS BY THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ETHICS

● Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is required by paragraph 4 of rule 35 that I place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this notice of a Senate employee who proposes to participate in a program, the principal objective of which is educational, sponsored by a foreign government or a foreign educational or charitable organization involving travel to a foreign country paid for by that foreign government or organization.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Ira H. Goldman of the staff of Senator WILSON to participate in a program sponsored by the Chinese Culture University in Taiwan, from January 7 through 15, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Goldman in the program in Taiwan, at the expense of the Chinese Culture University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interests of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 which would permit Mr. Gerald L. Grant of the staff of Senator SASSER, to participate in a program sponsored by the Tunghai University in Taipei, Taiwan, from January 15–22, 1984.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Grant in the program in Taiwan, at the expense of the Tunghai University, to discuss United States-Taiwan relations, is in the interests of the Senate and the United States.●

THE ADMINISTRATION'S INCOHERENT AGRICULTURE BUDGET

● Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, as the ranking Democrat on the Senate Agriculture Committee, I am concerned that the President's budget for fiscal year 1985 demonstrates a lack of understanding about the problems facing our Nation's farmers. Although there are many specific proposals in the Agriculture budget that I believe are ill-advised, a fundamental assumption made by the President's budget is in direct conflict with previously released economic forecasts. The contradiction I am referring to is certain to cause a great deal of confusion in the coming months and, in effect, makes the Agriculture budget incoherent.

The faulty assumption is found in a statement, appearing in the President's budget submission, that net farm cash income "is expected to reach a record level of over $42 billion in 1984." That statement directly contradicts official Department of Agriculture estimates that were included in the December issue of Agricultural Outlook. In the Department of Agriculture's official forecast, net farm cash income is estimated to be closer to $35 billion, a drop of about 20 percent from 1983.

To the administration that sent us a budget with a $180 billion deficit, a miscalculation of $7 billion might be considered a minor discrepancy. However, our Nation's farmers are likely to find that discrepancy very costly because, based on that assumption, the administration's budget states:

> The higher income will enable farmers to repay more of their loans and result in lower target price deficiency payments in 1984. As a result, total 1984 agriculture outlays are expected to decline by more than 50 percent from 1983.

If we are to have a responsible farm policy, the President needs to make sure the left hand knows what the right hand is doing. More important, he must make sure his economic analyses are based on the facts. I hope the administration will advise Congress soon on what it really expects to happen in terms of farm income in 1984.●

THE ECONOMIC EMERGENCY LOAN PROGRAM

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the farmers of Tennessee and every other State in the Union were recently subjected to yet another round of callous and indifferent treatment by this administration. I am referring to action instigated by the Office of Management and Budget stipulating that $550 million of the $600 million available under the economic emergency loan program be issued in the form of loan guarantees rather than direct loans to farmers in dire economic straits.

As many of my colleagues know, this administration has refused to implement the EE program, which Congress established in the 1981 farm bill. It took court action in the case of Kjeldahl against Block, to prod USDA into making assistance under this worthy program available to farmers. And at first blush, it appeared that Secretary Block was going to comply with the court order in this case. Indeed, based on USDA pronouncements regarding the EE program, many farmers in Tennessee and elsewhere began filling out the paperwork or making inquiry about the availability of direct loans under the EE program.

Mr. Stockman made use of the tool apportionment to change this scenario. In so doing, he pulled the rug out from under countless farm borrowers and the net effect of his actions will be many farmers going without assistance under the EE program. This is so as guaranteed loans are not financially attractive to many lenders as FmHA only guarantees up to 90 percent of the loan. Obtaining money in the form of loan guarantees is further complicated as many farmers in need of this type of assistance are not considered good credit risks by commercial lenders.

In addition, those farmers who have already filed for a direct loan under the EE program must now go through another sea of paperwork if they hope to obtain a guaranteed loan. Given this fact and that many farmers are now under the impression that money is not at all available under the EE program, it is safe to conclude that many of our farm constituents will simply forgo this continued burden and try to make ends meet some other way. One gets the impression that this is just as well with Mr. Stockman and his crew.

I recently wrote Mr. Stockman to protest his actions and to request that he reverse his ruling in this matter. I took this action not only because I have serious reservations about budgetary bureaucrats dictating farm policy, but also because Mr. Stockman's actions raise serious legal questions. The apportionment decision of OMB strikes me as being a clear violation of the spirit, if not the letter of Judge Flannery's decision. While USDA has been dragging its feet on the EE program for some time, I had hoped that offices of the executive branch would make a good faith effort in complying with court orders. In addition, I call into question the very use of the apportionment tool in this instance. There is some question as to the statutory authority for apportionment in this case.

I might point out Mr. President, that my views regarding Mr. Stockman's actions have been supported by farmers in Tennessee, as noted in several recent press clippings on this topic.

Several of my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, have expressed their outrage and indignation over this course of events. Senators HUDDLESTON and BOREN have requested hearings on this topic before the Senate Agriculture Committee. Senator BUMPERS has introduced Senate Resolution 333, which I am proud to join as a cosponsor, to address the concerns raised in this dispute. I applaud these actions and urge my colleagues to act expeditiously in considering Senate Resolution 333 and otherwise coming to the assistance of economically strapped farmers across the Nation.

Mr. President, I ask that a copy of my letter to Mr. Stockman and copies of editorials from the Nashville Tennessean and Murfreesboro News Journal be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., January 25, 1984.

Mr. DAVID STOCKMAN,
Director, Office of Management and Budget, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. STOCKMAN: I am writing to vigorously protest your recent action in stipulating that $550 million of Economic Emergency Loans available for farmers facing foreclosures be issued in the form of guaranteed loans rather than direct loans to farmers in Tennessee and across the country.

Farmers in Tennessee and other states have already applied and made inquiry about the availability of these loans in substantial numbers. This level of interest was to be expected, given the December, 1981, ruling that funds be made immediately available to hard-pressed farmers seeking to avoid farm foreclosures.

It is my hope that District Judge Thomas Flannery will review your decision in this matter and overrule your action. I believe such review is necessary as your actions call into question whether good faith efforts are being made to comply with Judge Flannery's court order. Your decision certainly does not comport with the spirit of Judge Flannery's decisions and indicates lack of due regard for the past history of the Economic Emergency Loan program.

Mr. Stockman, throughout the history of the Economic Emergency (E.E.) Loan program, no more than 5 percent of funds disbursed under the E.E. program have been in the form of guaranteed loans. Now you have ordered that more than 90 percent of E.E. loans be of a guaranteed nature.

In addition, I have serious reservations about your use of the apportionment authority in this instance. Your decision to apportion these funds arguably is not within the statutory authority for this fiscal tool set forth in 31 U.S.C. 1512. Considering the nature of the appropriations involved in the Economic Emergency Loan program and the impact the effective use of these funds can have on the farm economy, your interpretation of 31 U.S.C. 1512 insures that hard-pressed farmers may not receive timely loan funds under this program.

Finally, your actions in this matter are contrary to the congressional intent in this program and will work a severe hardship on Tennessee farmers that need these direct loans to stay in business. Therefore, I request that the Office of Management and Budget immediately reverse this ruling and process the direct loan applications that are on file in FmHA offices throughout the country.

Failure to reverse your decision will put more farmers out of business and add to the rising tide of farm foreclosures across the nation.

I await your prompt reply.

Sincerely,

JIM SASSER,
U.S. Senator.

[From the Nashville Tennessean, Feb. 7, 1984]

FARMER NOT BUDGET BUSTER

The Reagan administration, increasingly embarrassed by growing budget deficits, now seems to be trying to make the nation's financially-distressed farmers suffer the consequences of the deficits.

In 1981 Congress voted $600 million in emergency relief money to farmers. But the administration has withheld disbursement of the funds and Sen. Jim Sasser says the Office of Management and Budget—blaming the deficit—has ordered that only $50 million be allocated for direct loans and that the remaining $550 million be for guaranteed loans.

On a guaranteed loan, the OMB says, the government only has to put out money if the borrower defaults, but a direct loan comes directly out of government funds and that raises the deficit.

However, most farmers who are hard up for emergency relief as a result of drought, floods, high interest rates or other financial disaster have a difficult time obtaining guaranteed loans. Their credit is often poor because they are in bad financial condition. And lacking good credit, they would have to pay higher interest rates if any bank would lend them the money. Thus, the money voted by Congress is not likely to do them much good. Only the well-to-do farmer, who doesn't have to have the loan to stay in business, is likely to benefit.

Senator Sasser protested to the OMB that its hard-nosed policy had eliminated most Tennessee farmers from the program. "Failure to reverse your decision will put more farmers out of business and add to the rising tide of farm foreclosures across the nation," he wrote.

But this did not move the administration's budget makers or soften its well-established policy of favoring the rich and ignoring the middle- and low-income people in making budget decisions.

"I wonder if Senator Sasser is aware that we have a deficit of $180 billion," said Mr. Ed Dale, OMB spokesman.

It seems that when the Defense Department is swindled out of a few millions or billions by some arms makers that is just part of the business. But when a struggling farmer asks for a little aid to keep from losing his farm he is accused of busting the budget.

Well, it is certain that Senator Sasser does know about the deficit. So does just about everybody else. And they know the deficit wasn't caused by the aid Mr. Reagan has given to small family farmers.

[From the Murfreesboro (Tenn.) News Journal, Feb. 1, 1984]

AGREE WITH SASSER ON FMHA LOANS

We have to agree with Sen. Jim Sasser's allegations that a Reagan administration policy change is making it terribly difficult for farmers devastated by higher grain prices brought on by last summer's drought to obtain government-guaranteed emergency loans.

In fact, some Farmer's Home Administration officials in the state are so bothered by the policy change that they refuse to discuss it publicly.

As we understand it, $600 million was appropriated by the Congress in the form of low-interest or direct FmHA loans to help those farmers who suffer economic hardships due to events and expenses beyond their control.

But as the economy improved, the Reagan administration suggested that interest rates at commercial institutions were becoming so low that they were nearly equal with the interest rates in the FmHA-sponsored loans. So, the FmHA pulled back from the loan program, sending the financially strapped farmers to commercial banks for their loans.

But a federal court disagreed with the administration's decision on Dec. 22 ordered the loan program reinstituted. When the program was renewed, however, there was one major difference—instead of $550 million in direct loans to farmers and $50 million in low-interest monies available, the numbers were reversed.

Farmers were irate. They felt—and, according to some we talked with this week, still feel—that the administration reneged on them; that it held out the program as a lifeline to farmers drowning in red ink only for farmers to see it withdrawn.

In other words, those farmers who need the money the worst—and who thus cannot obtain the credit at commercial banks—are forced to battle each other for a share of the $50 million. Meanwhile, those farmers who are in better financial shape—those who can obtain money elsewhere—have to pay higher interest rates at the bank, a penalty of sorts for establishing good credit.

A classic "Catch-22."

Mr. Sasser has protested the policy to President Reagan and urged him to return the loan program to its original guidelines established in 1977—to make the most money available to those farmers who need it the most.

We wish him well in that endeavor.●

S. 1643—AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION AND CONSERVATION COMMITTEE SYSTEM

● Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to sponsor S. 1643, a bill to strengthen the operation of the agricultural stabilization and conservation committee system. This system, through farmer-elected community and county committees, has played a valuable role in the administration of the commodity stabilization, price support, acreage diversion, and soil conservation programs.

For over 50 years now, the ASC committees have been responsible for administering the farm programs at the local level. They have performed this function with fairness and equity under a variety of programs and economic circumstances. Their function remains as important today as it was when the ASC committee system was established in 1933.

Unfortunately, at various times over the years, and again recently, attempts have been made to eliminate or scale down the use of the local committees. Therefore, I believe that it is important that Congress act to insure that farmer-elected committeemen with first-hand knowledge of local problems will continue to be fully utilized in administering the farm programs at the county and community level.

S. 1643 will achieve that objective by making a number of changes in the law to require the continued operation and use of ASC committees and clarify the role of the committees. S. 1643, which was introduced by Senator ZORINSKY, is important legislation that deserves approval by the Senate. In addition to myself, the present cosponsors of the bill are Senators PRYOR, PRESSLER, ANDREWS, BAUCUS, BENTSEN, COCHRAN, DIXON, EXON, HEFLIN, LEAHY, SARBANES, and SASSER.●

PRODUCT LIABILITY LAW CHANGES HAVE PUBLIC SUPPORT

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I recently shared with my colleagues an article on the need for product liability reform. As I pointed out at that time, our hodgepodge system of existing product liability laws, differing from State to State, cost consumers and manufacturers alike literally billions of dollars. It is a hidden cost that drains our economy and prevents the fullest use of our productive potential.

I have another article on the subject to share with my colleagues. It comes from the Fond du Lac, Wisconsin Reporter and gives a pretty clear picture of why we need a Federal product liability law. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

UNIFORM PRODUCT LIABILITY LAW NEEDED AT FEDERAL LEVEL

Rules changes create frustrations for everyone, but having to meet different rules with the same product can be horrendous.

That's what many manufacturers face as they prepare their product for market from state to state. Rules for deciding product-related injury cases, know as product liability law, vary widely from one state to the next.

In fact, according to the Coalition for Uniform Product Liability Law and the Product Liability Alliance, only 30 states actually have such statutes and no two are alike. That makes it difficult if not impossible for manufacturers to meet the various—and sometimes conflicting—standards. It also makes it difficult for consumers to show damages.

Clearly, a federal law to protect both manufacturers and consumers is needed here, and Sen. Robert Kasten of Wisconsin is attempting to provide it.

Kasten's bill would provide a clear description of consumers' rights and manufacturers' responsibilities. It would provide courts with uniform legal rules to apply in all product liability cases. Those case numbers, by the way, have increased from 1,579 in 1974 to 8,944 in 1982.

It's new, fast-growing and enormously profitable legal industry without order, without even-handed regulation. Kasten's bill, S. 44, which has 25 co-sponsors in the Senate, establishes ground rules. It merges the various legal theories currently used in product liability actions into one liability law and should end the procedural disputes that now pervade product liability litigation.

In Wisconsin, S. 44 would strengthen the rights of consumers to recover damages.

The bill is endorsed by the administration and has bipartisan support in both houses of Congress. It is expected to be favorably reported out of the Senate Commerce Committee later this month or early February, with full Senate action expected by spring.

It is needed legislation and both Sen. Kasten and Sen. William Proxmire should be made aware of public support for the bill.●

CONFERENCE AGREEMENT ON REHABILITATION AMENDMENTS OF 1984

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the conference agreement on the Rehabilitation Amendments of 1984. I commend my distinguished colleagues Senator WEICKER and Senator RANDOLPH for their work on this important legislation and for their commitment to America's handicapped citizens.

The Rehabilitation Amendments of 1984 will continue and expand rehabilitation services for handicapped individuals. This vocational rehabilitation program has a long history of providing individuals who are physically and mentally handicapped valuable and effective assistance in the development of work skills and the application of those skills through employment. It has proven to be very cost effective by returning, through tax payments and other program savings, an estimated $10 for every $1 spent on rehabilitation.

I believe that these amendments reaffirm our Nation's commitment to providing handicapped citizens every opportunity to reach their full potential as individuals and as valuable, contributing members of our society. I urge the immediate adoption of this conference report.●

THE KISSINGER COMMISSION REPORT ON CENTRAL AMERICA

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today the Foreign Relations Committee held hearings on the Kissinger Commission report on Central America.

As chairman of the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee, I took a particular interest in the report of the Kissinger Commission. I was most interested in the prescriptions which would be proposed by Dr. Kissinger and his group of physicians ministering to the health of the region.

I am afraid that the prognosis is bleak. The report is a mandate for socialism, financed by the U.S. taxpayer.

I am reluctant to make such a judgment. No one has been a stronger supporter of assistance to the beleaguered countries of Central America than I. Because of the intensive work on the area that we have done in the subcommittee, I am keenly aware of the danger that a Socialist or Communist Central America would present to our own national security. Yet I feel it my duty to the people of the United States, and to President Reagan himself, to state that the prescriptions presented by the Commission are a danger to our national security equal to those of the Communist incursion.

The obvious purpose of the Commission was to restore the economy of the Central American region, revitalize its institutions, and bring peace to its inhabitants. I see scarcely anything in the proposal which would accomplish of these objectives.

Mr. President, if this were merely another academic study to be filed away on a shelf, one might pronounce it "interesting" as a polite means of dismissal. However, it is interesting only because it is a period piece, dredging up all the old policies of the past—the policies which failed to produce prosperity and development in the past. Unfortunately, even before this Senate has had an opportunity to discuss it, or evaluate its merits, the State Department has turned it into a legislative proposal firmly backed by a steamroller. I think we need to examine it slowly and deliberately.

If this were a realistic proposal to spend $8.4 billion to save Central America, it would be cheap at twice the price. But the American taxpayers are notoriously wary about the way Congress throws around their money. If they had a chance to analyze the proposals in detail, they would find little to give them confidence that the $8.4 billion would stabilize Central America at all. In all likelihood, the most it will do is to stabilize certain American commercial banks.

If we examine this proposal, we find that it is divided into two sections: $8 billion in so-called developmental aid, and $400 million in military aid.

The $8 billion in developmental aid is simply another round of the same nostrums that have failed in the past—the notion that central planning, multilateral institutions, central bank manipulation, and international cartels can build a sound and productive economy. Although the prose is liberally spiked with appeals to support the private sector, the actual mechanisms put forward run in exactly the opposite direction—that is to say, in the direction of state intervention and control of the economy. The report proposes no less than the following:

First. The resuscitation of the virtually defunct and discredited Central American Common Market, a concept that was the creature of the ill-fated Alliance for Progress. The Alliance itself was a triumph for the statist mentality of the nonmarket economy, but a failure in producing results. The Central American Common Market produced the typical result of thinking based on extreme market protection and cartels—a distorted economy based on high-priced industry and inadequate production. Experts believe that it set Central America back at least 10 to 20 years in the development of competitive free enterprise. We should not give one dime to Central America except upon the condition that all the remnants of the Common Market be dismantled.

Second. The establishment of a CACM Fund, which is supposed to refinance the trade deficits created by the CACM cartels. Such a fund would simply postpone the day of reckoning and perpetuate economic distortion. Needless to say this refinancing would be paid for by the U.S. taxpayer.

Third. U.S. membership in the Central American Bank for Economic Integration, supposedly to provide new financing for small businesses. Once again the U.S. taxpayer would provide the crutch for economies limping along with socialism.

Fourth. Establishment of a trade credit insurance program within Eximbank, to provide guarantees to U.S. commercial banks at U.S. taxpayers' expense. As the saying goes, here we go again. It is interesting to note that such insurance is not now available, according to the Kissinger Commission report, because "the risks of nonrepayment are viewed as excessive."

Fifth. The establishment of a so-called Emergency Action Committee of citizens from the region to propose "public-private initiatives." But it seems to me that the problem with the private sector is that there is already too much public initiative.

Sixth. The use of AID programs, that is, U.S. taxpayers' funds, to provide "infrastructure and housing." But such programs historically have put the cart before the horse. Infrastructure and housing follow, not precede, sound economic development and are paid for by it. To put it first is to burden the development process and postpone the achievement of the humanitarian goals which inspired the aid.

Seventh. Reduction of nontariff trade barriers with regard to textiles, sugar, and meat. Access to U.S. markets is a financial benefit which is paid for by the export of U.S. jobs.

Eighth. Extension of OPIC guarantees to the region, which presently is considered too risky to qualify. Naturally the U.S. taxpayers would take the risk.

Mr. President, no doubt all of these measures would in a certain respect benefit certain parts of the private sector in the Central American countries. But they are benefits conferred at the expense of free enterprise generally. There are always the kinds of businessmen who fear the free market, but are prepared to make millions out of exclusive contracts or monopolies granted by governments or made possible by State controls which eliminate competition. Such behavior is not unknown in the United States. But the defects of our system, which constitute a small part of our economy, should not be exported and mandated in small economies where they become the rule.

Now, Mr. President, there remain two other areas of comments which I will get to in a moment. Those which I have mentioned so far are those which have failed in the past, precisely because they deal with symptoms, and not with causes. Not one of them, not all of them together, can provide a climate for healthy free enterprise.

Free enterprise can grow only where it is allowed to grow. There is no mention whatsoever in the Kissinger Commission report of those pervasive barriers to development which are common throughout Central America, and, indeed, throughout the less developed countries generally. The LDC's are less developed because they do not have the political will to remove these barriers.

There is much in the report about budget deficits and the crisis of debt rescheduling. There is little in the report about the real causes of the budget deficits—the political causes—and the poor judgment of the bankers who overextended themselves. There is much talk about the high costs of oil, and the failure of the world economy generally. But there is nothing said about the size of government payrolls in relation to GNP, the waste, losses, and inefficiencies created by government-owned monopolies and banking systems, the imposition of wage and price controls, the maintenance of minimum wage requirements in the face of mounting unemployment, the use of marketing boards to set artificially low agricultural prices, the artificially established and manipulated exchange rates, the excessive controls on establishing and operating new enterprises, the stubborn increase of export taxes in the face of falling world demand, and the political allocation of credit and foreign exchange.

Why should the U.S. taxpayer be asked to finance economic recovery when the whole issue of real reform is studiously ignored? The measures proposed by the Kissinger Commission would pour good money after bad, with little hope that a fundamentally stable economy could emerge in the region.

And, indeed, why is nothing said about the extensive corruption which is rampant not only in governmental and private institutions, but in political parties from left to right? While the U.S. system is by no means free from such a taint, there are many countervailing pressures to reveal and halt such practices. In many of the countries in the Central American region, as elsewhere, the levers of statist power provide a built-in bias for corruption. By reducing statism, these countries could decrease many opportunities for corruption. But once again, the Kissinger prescriptions work in the opposite direction: The $8.4 billion in a statist framework would increase corruption.

Nor should the danger be looked at in a purely moralistic sense. From the standpoint of economic development, corruption is a waste of needed capital, a diversion of resources, frequently out of the country, a heavy tax on businesses that are operating honestly, and a strong disincentive to new investment both from domestic and international sources.

Finally, Mr. President, there remain two other significant recommendations of the Kissinger Commission, both of which would make it impossible to restore stability and hope for the region. I refer first to the proposed Central American Development Organization (CADO), and second, to the repeated emphasis on confiscation and redistribution of productive agricultural lands, a process that is hidden behind that notorious euphemism, "land reform."

The Central American Development Organization, or CADO, is an interesting new hybrid. At first in the Kissinger Commission report it is described as a "privately-owned venture capital company." Yet later on it becomes clear that the initial capital for CADO would be put up by the U.S. taxpayer in the form of a long-term loan. And although we are told that those organizing the company would be expert entrepreneurs, it soon becomes clear that membership on the board would include government and union representatives, with only a few from private enterprise. In other words, the membership of CADO would be essentially political, with all the tensions and theories of economic development that such an approach necessarily suggests. In fact, the purpose of CADO would be far reaching, and set priorities for the development of the whole region.

The proposed legislation implementing the Kissinger Commission report states the purposes of CADO as follows:

> Such organization should serve the purpose of providing an effective forum for an open dialogue on and continuous review of Central America's political, economic, and social development, and should be composed of individuals from donor countries and participating Central American countries, including individuals from the private sector.

It is clear from the Kissinger report that CADO would become the ultimate czar not only of the Central American economy, but of its social and political structure. The report invests CADO with all the cliches of central planning, including the establishment of economic priorities, modernization of private institutions, promotion of social change, and comprehensive regional development.

What is even more disturbing is that CADO would get control over the distribution of U.S. taxpayers' funds in two ways: First, its own direct funding from the United States would be distributed by decisions of CADO, including the recipient nations. The United States would once more be in the position it is with the United Nations and other multilateral aid agencies, that is, our only power would make the determinations of social, political, judicial, and economic progress that would trigger cutoffs off U.S. direct aid. Thus, although the Kissinger Commission report is self-serving about requiring only "reports" and not "linkage," the mechanism for aid cutoffs, including military aid, is quietly set in place, with the ultimate decisions on U.S. security interests being turned over to a body of unspecified philosophical composition.

CADO is, in short, the engine of socialism, the kind of proposal that would seem more likely to come out of a meeting of the Socialist International than from freedom-loving Americans.

The other disturbing aspect of the Kissinger Commission report is the emphasis given to the seizure and redistribution of productive agrarian resources. The confiscation of a productive economic system, and its dismemberment of collectivization, is an integral part of every Marxist regime. Even though it makes no sense economically, and usually results in a lower standard of living for the peasant who is its victim, agrarian reform is always a high ideological priority for those trying to destroy a traditional, evolving society.

El Salvador has been no exception. The recent report of the AID Inspector General portrays a program that is an economic failure, a colossal waste of economic and human resources, a center of corruption, and an unauditable nightmare. Moreover, there are strong indications in the IG's report that $2 million of U.S. taxpayers' money, discovered in a spot check, may have been spent in contravention of U.S. law.

Be that as it may, land reform has contributed more to the disintegration of the social and economic fabric off El Salvador than the terrorist attacks of the Communist guerrillas against the industrial infrastructure. The so-called land reform program dismantled the managerial and capital skills of the most advanced agricultural institutions in the country, those that were responsible for the best paying jobs in the agricultural sector and that were earning the most foreign exchange. It has aggravated the tensions in society by uprooting families and communities, while at the same time thwarting the hopes of those to whom great promises were given. Moreover, by setting aside the constitutional and legal system of the country, this revolutionary program has undercut the notion of just law so essential to the judicial process.

Those who are now complaining about the failure of the judicial system in El Salvador are all too often the very ones who were urging the setting aside of the legal system of the country in order to promote ideological ends.

The proponents of confiscation of land created the myth of a landed "oligarchy" of 14 families that controlled the country. But when the United States imposed the program of confiscation on El Salvador, it turned out that hundreds and hundreds of families lost their land in phase I and thousands lost their land in phase II. So-called land reform hard very little to do with equity, and a lot to do with the cynicism of political revolution and political power. The purpose of this program was to destory the base of political support of the middle class and the most productive sector of the economy.

The United States should disassociate itself in every way from the program of land confiscation and collectivization. U.S. law provides that the U.S. taxpayers' money should not go to underwrite this shameful and destructive program. Yet the Kissinger Commission report assumes that we should continue to back such a failure. Such a conclusion not only invalidates the fundamental recommendations of the Commission, but will contribute greatly to further instability in the region.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I would like to add a note on military aid. I favor military aid for the region. There is no need to send U.S. soldiers into the region, when the local citizens are perfectly willing to fight for freedom. Yet because of the desperate situation in El Salvador, there are some, even conservatives, who would urge us to swallow the $8 billion elephant of socialism in order to catch the $400 million gnat of military aid.

But the only reason to give military aid is to reinforce the national security interests of the United States. Yet the Kissinger Commission would have us turn over that decision ultimately to CADO, as mentioned before, with an undetermined political makeup. It is CADO which would make the decisions on human rights and social reform which would turn on the spigot of U.S. military aid.

Such an abdication of U.S. interests is totally unacceptable.

It seems to me that the priorities of the Kissinger Commission are totally reversed. There is a war on in Central America. As long as there is a war on, there will be economic disruption and social suffering. We cannot expect that the Salvadorans can divide their energies between social and political reforms while trying to win a war at the same time.

The first step should be the eradication of the guerrilla movement; only after that can we expect progress toward a stable society. The people of El Salvador showed through the electoral process that they would support a government that is less than perfect in order to restore peace and order. We must give the people of El Salvador the military means to win the guerrilla conflict, without making it conditional upon achieving sweeping social reforms as a precondition.

The Kissinger Commission report, therefore, totally misses the mark. If its recommendations are adopted, they will contribute to the further disintegration of social structures in Central America, and hasten the spread of marxism. The Kissinger Commission recommendations will result in a disappointment of the legitimate aspirations of the people of the region for freedom. The more money that is poured into the statist structures promoted by the Kissinger Commission report, the greater will be the corruption, the inefficiency, the cynicism, and the suffering of the people. If we wish to protect our own interests and to give the people of Central America a chance to win their freedom, we must reject those recommendations.●

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on June 20, 1983, by a vote of 75 to nothing, the Senate passed S. 336, the Labor Management Racketeering Act of 1983. THE KNOXVILLE LINCOLN DAY DINNER

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am here, obviously, in the Chamber of the Senate of the United States and not in Knoxville, Tenn., where I was supposed to be. But due to the blessings of airline deregulation, United Airlines now only has two flights a day to Knoxville and the last one left at 3 o'clock. As a result, I shall not be in attendance tonight at the Lincoln Day dinner in Knoxville, which, by the way, is one of the oldest Lincoln Day dinners in the United States. It will be attended by somewhere between 1,500 and 2,000 dedicated, loyal, intelligent and well represented Republicans.

I regret not being there. But I am sure they will understand, because when I became leader, I made a solemn promise to myself that, as much as I might hate missing engagements, even engagements of long standing, my primary responsibility is here and not elsewhere. So the cancellation is another in a series of cancellations, going back now for some years.

I have no regrets about that, Mr. President. I do not take lightly the responsibility given to me by my colleagues in the Senate. I am happy to say that in most instances, almost every instance, my friends, fellow Tennesseans and constituents, particularly my constituents in Tennessee and particularly Knoxville, understand why I have to do what I have to do. It is still a matter of great regret to me because tonight will be the first Knoxville Lincoln Day dinner I have missed since 1948. That is a long time. I have attended every one since that one in 1948 and they have all been smashing successes.

I have heard great speakers on every occasion—the late Senator Robert Taft, Thurston Morton, John Sherman Cooper, Everett Dirksen. The list can go on and on. And Senator Alan Simpson, who regaled the audience with not only wisdom but wit. They are still talking about that speech, especially the ladies.

But, Mr. President, I am sure they will be well served at the Lincoln Day dinner tonight, because my friend and former colleague, Ambassador William Brock, will be the speaker there.

I wish to offer my apologies to Bill Brock also, because we were going to fly back tonight. I was looking forward to that visit as I hope he looks forward to tonight in Knoxville.

At any rate, Mr. President, I want to take this brief opportunity to say to my friend and colleagues in the Senate who are listening, particularly to my friends and constituents in Tennessee, that I am genuinely sorry I am not there but am here.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, in response to what the majority leader was saying about the event he is missing in Knoxville, it was my great personal privilege last year, at his invitation, to address that group. It is one of the most delightful times I have had. I ran into old friends, people I played football with when I weighed 260 pounds and had hair. It was a delightful experience.

You are loved there and I know they will miss you tonight, Mr. Leader. It is a great event. People here really do not know how marvelous a thing it is. I appreciate having been invited.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, could my friend inform the Senate just what century it was when he had hair?

Mr. SIMPSON. When?

Mr. LEVIN. What century?

Mr. SIMPSON. In the current century.

Mr. LEVIN. And you weighed 260 pounds?

Mr. SIMPSON. That is right. I thought beer was food.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see the distinguished Senator from Michigan is on the floor now and the distinguished minority leader. The manager in behalf of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee is here, so I yield the floor.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I wonder if we could have a brief quorum call so I could get together with the majority leader for his reaction to a suggestion by a number of my colleagues relative to the death penalty bill.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMPSON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as I have announced earlier, it is the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to turn to the consideration of the death penalty bill, which I will do in a moment, but as we have in other cases in the so-called crime package sequence I would not propound the following unanimous-consent request which has been examined by the minority leader, by the representatives of the chairman, and I believe there is no objection.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the consideration of S. 1765, which is Calendar Order No. 356, a bill dealing with the death penalty, no amendments dealing with the control of firearms, the Hobbs Act, the Federal Tort Claims Act, or the proposed limitation of jurisdiction of authority of the Federal judiciary be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The text of the agreement follows:

Ordered, That during the consideration of S. 1765 (Order No. 356), a bill to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death, and for other purposes, no amendments dealing with the control of firearms, the Hobbs Act, the Federal Tort Claims Act, or the proposed limitation of jurisdiction of authority of the Federal Judiciary, shall be in order.

Ordered further, That if any emergency measure dealing with the deployment of troops in Lebanon is available, the Majority Leader, after consultation with the Minority Leader, may temporarily set aside S. 1765, notwithstanding the invocation of cloture thereon. (Feb. 7, 1984)

ORDER OF PROCEDURE ON S. 1765

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, before I ask the Senate to turn to the consideration of the death penalty bill, let me describe for Members how I visualize this matter working.

First, Mr. President, it would be the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to turn to the consideration of that measure by unanimous consent. I hope there will not be an objection. If and when the Senate then has the bill before it, given the circumstances involved in private conversations which have occurred with respect to the length of debate, it would be the intention of the leadership on this side to file a cloture motion under the provisions of rule XXII to limit debate on the bill. If that is done today, under the rule the vote would occur 1 hour after we convene on Thursday. But I am willing to adjust that time as far as this side is concerned to suit the convenience of Senators who are principally concerned with this measure, especially the Senator from Michigan (Mr.

LEVIN) and the distinguished chairman (Mr. THURMOND), but in a word I would not expect the cloture vote to occur until some time late Thursday.

I would also hope that we could obtain, and in a moment I may ask, unanimous consent also to interrupt for a period of not to exceed a brief time for the consideration of the career criminal bill. I will not ask consent to bring it up but consent to interrupt for the purpose of attempting to bring it up.

Now, Mr. President, the final part of my statement is this. If cloture is invoked on Thursday and barring unforeseen exigent circumstances, it would not be the intention of the leadership to ask the Senate to be in on Friday of this week but, rather, to either adjourn as is now contemplated or, if circumstances here and abroad suggest that we should not adjourn, to recess on some basis, but in any event to take up the death penalty bill when we come back from the recess period which has been scheduled, and it would then be pending in a postcloture situation.

Now, understanding that if cloture is not invoked, this would not apply, but if cloture is invoked it would not be the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to be in on Friday to transact any other business.

The single exception, Mr. President, which occurred to me after my conversation with the minority leader and with others, especially with the Senator from Michigan, is I have made a commitment that after death penalty I will attempt to reach the career criminal bill.

Now, before I put the unanimous consent request for the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that item, so that I can clarify that point which I had not thought of before, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. As I sometimes do, I think I overcomplicated the situation with respect to the career criminal bill. I have already advised the Senator from Pennsylvania in a private conversation in the well of the Senate that I was not prepared to take up the career criminal bill before death penalty, but I would take it up after death penalty. So what I wish to say then is that after we dispose of the death penalty bill it is the intention of the leadership on this side to go to the career criminal bill, so it will not require any further modification of the situation.

Now, to review, Mr. President, in a moment I will ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of the death penalty bill, S. 1765. I will file a cloture motion. The vote on that will occur on Thursday, and I will be glad to negotiate with the minority leader and Senator LEVIN and the chairman of the committee on a time for that vote other than the 1 hour after we convene, and I would suggest late Thursday. If cloture would be invoked, it would not be the intention of the leadership on this side to be in on Friday barring emergency circumstances.

When we return from the Lincoln Day period, the death penalty measure will be pending, with the full understanding that if we have to be in during that period, we would not turn to the bill until after that time has expired. That is the general format.

DEATH PENALTY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, with that arrangement in mind, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 356, S. 1765.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1765) to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, as I indicated earlier, I now send to the desk a cloture motion and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provision of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on S. 1765, a bill to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death, and for other purposes.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT—S. 1765

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I intend to vote for cloture. I would try to contemplate a situation which might arise, and the majority leader may want to take action now to preempt that situation. In the event cloture is invoked—as I say, I am going to vote for cloture and hope it is invoked—then, under the rule, no other business could be disposed of until the completion of action on that measure.

It might very well be that there would be a situation in which the majority leader would want very much, if it involves an emergency concerning our men in Lebanon, to temporarily get away from the death penalty bill.

I would be willing to take it on myself to give the majority leader consent now to go off the death penalty bill in that kind of circumstance only, during that week. I think that in the interest of our national security, the majority leader should have that privilege, to go off the death penalty bill for that one exception only.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, that is a very pertinent and relevant suggestion. Otherwise, there would be no choice except to try to force a vote on final passage, in order to be released from the provisions of rule XXII, which would be unfair to all parties concerned. There would be no alternative if there were truly an emergency measure.

I would very much like to do that; and if the minority leader is prepared for me to do so, I will propound a unanimous-consent request at this time.

Mr. BYRD. I am willing to do that, and I believe that my colleagues on this side, under the circumstances, would not dispose of it.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that if closure is invoked on the pending measure, notwithstanding the provisions of rule XXII, after consulting with the minority leader, the majority leader be authorized to temporarily lay aside this measure and proceed to the consideration of any emergency measure dealing with the deployment of our troops in Lebanon.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I do not object, I fully concur.

I presume that nothing in that request modifies the stated intention of the majority leader relevant to the death penalty bill coming up after that.

Mr. BAKER. No, it does not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Michigan for not objecting, and I particularly thank the minority leader for making that very responsible and much appreciated suggestion.

Mr. President, I think the better part of discretion is for the Senate to go out now. It is 7:16.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEBANON

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have one other matter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by the President of the United States, dated today, dealing with the situation in Lebanon.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

The bloodshed we have witnessed in Lebanon over the last several days only demonstrates once again the length to which the forces of violence and intimidation are prepared to go to prevent a peaceful reconciliation process from taking place. If a moderate government is overthrown because it had the courage to turn in the direction of peace, what hope can there be that other moderates in the region will risk committing themselves to a similar course? Yielding to violence and terrorism today may seem to provide temporary relief, but such a course is sure to lead to a more dangerous and less manageable future crisis. Even before the latest outbreak of violence, we had been considering ways of reconcentrating our forces and the nature of our support in order to take the initiative away from the terrorists. Far from deterring us from this course, recent events only confirm the importance of the decisive new steps I want to outline for you now. Thus, after consultation with our MNF partners and President Gemayel and at his request, we are prepared to do the following:

First, to enhance the safety of American and other MNF personnel in Lebanon, I have authorized U.S. Naval forces, under the existing mandate of the MNF, to provide naval gun fire and air support against any units firing into greater Beirut from parts of Lebanon controlled by Syria, as well as against any units directly attacking American or MNF personnel and facilities. Those who conduct these attacks will no longer have sanctuary from which to bombard Beirut at will. We will stand firm to deter those who seek to influence Lebanon's future by intimidation.

Second, when the government of Lebanon is able to reconstitute itself into a broadly-based representative government, we will vigorously accelerate the training, equipping and support of the Lebanese armed forces, on whom the primary responsibility rests for maintaining stability in Lebanon. We will speed up delivery of equipment; we will improve the flow of information to help counter hostile bombardments; and we will intensify training in counter terrorism to help the Lebanese front, the terrorist threat that poses such a danger to Lebanon, to Americans in Lebanon, and indeed to peace in the Middle East.

Third, in conjunction with these steps, I have asked Secretary of Defense Weinberger to present to me a plan for redeployment of the Marines from Beirut Airport to their ships offshore. This redeployment will begin shortly and will proceed in stages. U.S. military personnel will remain on the ground in Lebanon for training and equipping the Lebanese Army and protecting the remaining personnel. These are conditional functions that U.S. personnel perform in many friendly countries. Our Naval and Marine forces offshore will stand ready, as before, to provide support for the protection of American and other MNF personnel in Lebanon and thereby help ensure security in the Beirut area as I have described.

These measures, I believe, will strengthen our ability to do the job we set out to do—and to sustain our efforts over the long term. They are consistent with the compromise joint resolution worked out last October with the Congress with respect to our participation in the multi-national force.

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on tomorrow, the Senate will be in at 11 a.m.

After the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, three Senators will be recognized on special orders of not to exceed 15 minutes each: Senator DURENBERGER, Senator SASSER, and the distinguished minority leader, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I wonder if the majority leader would include a request that the time that has been provided for me may be transferred to Senator SASSER, in the event I am off the floor.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. I further ask unanimous consent that after the execution of the special orders, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend past 12:30 p.m., in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

At the closing of the period for the transaction of routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 1765, the death penalty bill.

Mr. President, it may very well be that amendments will be offered during debate tomorrow, and votes may be anticipated tomorrow.

The intention of the leadership on this side is to attempt to establish by unanimous consent a time certain for the vote on cloture, pursuant to the motion filed today, late in the day on Thursday, the day after tomorrow.

Mr. President, I know of no other matter to bring to the attention of the Senate.

RECESS TO 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see no other Senator seeking recognition. I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate now stand in recess until the hour of 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 7:19 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 8, 1984, at 11 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LEADERSHIP IN EDUCATIONAL ADMINISTRATION DEVELOPMENT ACT

HON. THOMAS E. PETRI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, excellence in education has become a major concern here in Congress and throughout America. Today, I am introducing legislation that would address this concern by seeking to improve the leadership abilities of school principals and other administrative personnel.

Four years ago, the Education and Labor Committee, on which I serve, received testimony from Dr. Ronald Edmonds, senior assistant to the chancellor for instruction of the New York City Public Schools. Dr. Edmonds told of his research showing that the single most important key to good schools is, in his words, "the style of leadership of the principal." When the renewed interest about excellence in education cropped up last year, I remembered Dr. Edmonds' advice.

In the past 4 years, an accumulating body of research has proved the importance of principal leadership for education quality. Two recent articles are especially instructive in this respect: JudithLittle's "The Effective Principal" in the August-September 1982 issue of American Education, and Michael Cohen's "Effective Schools: Accumulating Research Findings" in the January-February 1982 issue of the same magazine. Both authors cite extensive studies showing that good principals create good schools. The Blaney Institute, a public policy center in Wisconsin, recently concluded, "In order to upgrade the quality of leadership in public schools, society will have to change the way it trains its principals and superintendents." The time has come to implement this advice.

My new legislation would apply this advice by providing seed money to establish regional technical assistance centers to promote the development of the leadership skills of elementary and secondary school principals. One regional center would be created in each Federal region to serve the entire region. The center would be tied to a local university, and would draw on established expertise in both business administration and education.

The centers would become laboratories for training and research in effective school leadership. Seminars, internships, consultation, and a model administrative program would reach out to serve principals throughout the region—much like agricultural experiment stations reach out to serve the farmer. Efforts should focus on helping principals already at work and new principals entering the field. A wealth of information exists on good school leadership—drawn from business, government, and existing effective schools. That information should be made more readily available to all principals.

In addition to these regional centers, some money would be set aside for metropolitan training centers. These experimental metropolitan centers would be similar to the regional centers, but each would serve only an individual urban area. Hopefully, a few such metropolitan centers could serve as models for non-federally funded training centers in other urban areas.

All regional and metropolitan centers would be chosen on a competitive basis to insure that the best proposals are funded. The Federal funding provided by this legislation would be enough only to get these centers going on a 50/50 matching basis for 3 years. Once they prove their worth, public and private funding from the region served should be able to keep them going. In this way, initial seed money will yield a continuing harvest of better schools.

Everyone is talking about excellence in education. This legislation is one step toward achieving that excellence in a cost-effective manner. Mr. CHAFEE is introducing parallel legislation in the Senate. Good administrative leadership is a key to good schools. I invite all my colleagues to join Mr. GOODLING as cosponsors of this bill to improve school leadership. The full text of the bill follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE; PURPOSE

SECTION 1. (a) This Act may be cited as the "Leadership in Educational Administration Development Act of 1984".

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to improve the level of student achievement in elementary and secondary schools through the enhancement of the leadership skills of school administrators by—

(1) establishing regional technical assistance centers to promote the development of the leadership skills of elementary and secondary school administrators; and

(2) establishing a program to assist local educational agencies in forming metropolitan training centers to promote such development.

(c) It is the intention of Congress that contractors seeking to establish technical assistance and training centers should design programs which upgrade the skills of elementary and secondary school administrators in—

(1) enhancing the schoolwide learning environment by assessing the school climate, setting clear goals for improvement, and devising strategies for completing manageable projects with measurable objectives;

(2) evaluating the school curriculum in order to assess its effectiveness in meeting academic goals;

(3) developing skills in instructional analysis to improve the quality of teaching through classroom observation and supervision;

(4) mastering and implementing objective techniques for evaluating teacher performance; and

(5) improving communication, problem-solving, student discipline, time-management, and budgetary skills.

SEC. 2. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this Act such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1985 and each of the five succeeding fiscal years.

(b) Of the amount appropriated pursuant to subsection (a) for any fiscal year, the Secretary shall first make available such amount, not to exceed $1,500,000 per region, as may be necessary for establishing and operating a regional technical assistance center in each Federal region under section 3 of this Act. The remainder of such appropriated amount shall be available for carrying out section 4 of this Act.

REGIONAL TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE CENTERS

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary shall, subject to the availability of funds pursuant to section 2, enter into a contract with an institution of higher education (or consortium of such institutions) in each Federal region for the establishment and operation of a regional technical assistance center in accordance with the requirements of this section and section 5. The contractor may associate with a private management agency for performance of such contract.

(B) offer internships in business, industry, and effective school districts to school administrators, for the purpose of promoting improved leadership skills of such administrators;

(8) to disseminate information on leadership skills associated with effective schools; and

(9) to establish model administrator projects.

(c) In making a selection among applicants for any contract under this section, the Secretary shall take into account whether the applicant, if selected, would be able to operate its programs in a manner which would—

(1) emphasize development of leadership skills identified by graduate schools of management and graduate schools of education; and

(2) assure the provision of assistance to school administrators from local educational agencies in which the number of pupils in the average daily attendance is less than 2,500.

METROPOLITAN TRAINING CENTERS

SEC. 4. (a)(1) The Secretary shall, subject to the availability of funds pursuant to section 2, enter into contracts with local educational agencies, intermediate school districts, State educational agencies, institutions of higher education, private management organizations, or non-profit organizations (or consortium of such entities) for the establishment and operation of training centers in eligible local educational agencies in accordance with the requirements of this section and section 5.

(2) For purposes of paragraph (1), the term "eligible local educational agency" means any local educational agency all or any part of which is located within a standard metropolitan statistical area with a population of 250,000 or more.

(b) Each contract entered into under subsection (a) shall require the contractor—

(1) to make the services of the training center available on an equitable basis, taking into account the contribution of the various local educational agencies to the cost of the center, to school administrators from each of the local educational agencies located, in part or in whole, within the standard metropolitan statistical area served by that contractor;

(2) to perform the same functions as are required of contractors pursuant to paragraphs (2) through (8) of section 3(b); and

(3) to take such actions as may be necessary to coordinate the contractor's operations with the regional technical assistance center for that contractor's Federal region for the purpose of sharing resources and avoiding duplication of services.

(c) In making a selection among applicants for any contract under this section, the Secretary shall—

(1) accept only the applications which demonstrate the existence of a prior agreement, among local educational agencies with more than one-half of the pupils in average daily attendance within the standard metropolitan statistical area to be served by the training center, to utilize the center;

(2) take into account whether the applicant, if selected, would be able to operate its programs in a manner which would—

(A) emphasize the provision of assistance to school administrators from local educational agencies in which the number of pupils in average daily attendance is more than 2,500; and

(B) give preference, in the provision of such assistance, to consortia of local educational agencies.

GENERAL CRITERIA FOR CONTRACTS

SEC. 5. (a) The following conditions shall apply to each contract under sections 3 and 4:

(1) The contract shall assure the involvement of private sector managers and executives in the conduct of such programs.

(2) The contract shall contain assurances of an ongoing organizational commitment to carrying out the purposes of this Act through (A) obtaining matching funds for such programs at least equal in amount to the amount of funds provided under this Act, (B) making inkind contributions to such programs, (C) demonstrating a commitment to continue to operate such programs after expiration of funding under this Act, and (D) organizing a policy advisory committee including (but not limited to) representatives from business, private foundations, and local and State educational agencies.

(3) The contract shall demonstrate the level of development of human relations skills which its programs will instill by (A) identifying the credentials of the staff responsible for such development; (B) describing the manner in which such skills will be developed; and (C) describing the manner in which the program deals with human relations issues facing education administrators.

(4) The contract shall establish a system for the evaluation of the programs conducted.

(b) Each contract under sections 3 and 4 shall be for a term of three years, subject to the availability of funds pursuant to section 2. Such contract shall not be renewable, except that a single three-year extension may be granted if the contractor agrees to maintain the programs with assistance under this Act reduced by one-half.

OUR HOME THE CHESAPEAKE BAY

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the 350th anniversary of the founding of the State of Maryland, the people of our great State are expressing their pride in many ways. Many of the most noteworthy contributions have come from schoolchildren. One such contribution is the winning essay from the Pocomoke High School essay contest of this year. It is a fine piece worthy of attention. The author, Ms. Kelly Morris, chose as her topic, the Chesapeake Bay, our precious resource which finds itself increasingly a victim of pollution. Ms. Morris' essay, a timely message calling for improved management of the bay, is entitled: "Our Home the Chesapeake Bay." I would like to share her piece with you today.

OUR HOME THE CHESAPEAKE BAY

(By Kelly Morris)

Our Chesapeake Bay began 20,000 years ago when the Susquehanna River finished carving the valley that our bay would one day occupy. Our bay is 200 miles long and ranges in width from 4 miles to 40 miles.

Each year the water becomes more polluted; and the fish, crabs, oysters, and other living organisms die by the thousands. Pollution that kills these organisms results from the cooling of nuclear power plants such as Calvert Cliffs, disposal of industrial wastes into the bay, and agricultural runoff. If natural resources are to stay alive, we need to care for our bay.

Aside from pollution, our bay still has much to offer. We use the bay as an avenue for shipping goods to and from other countries, and we use it as a training ground for the military such as Bloodsworth Island near Annapolis. We also use the bay as a recreational facility for swimming, fishing, sailing or boating. An example is Sandy Point State Park.

We should identify the uses of the bay that we want to conserve and the characteristics of the bay on which those uses depend. Then we should attempt to develop effective management strategies to keep the bay alive. Man is the only one who can plan the bay's future.●

CUSHING HOSPITAL

HON. JAMES M. SHANNON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, Cushing Hospital in Framingham, Mass., first opened its doors in 1943, a U.S. Army hospital built to treat servicemen wounded in World War II. After the war, Cushing Hospital continued to symbolize the ideal of public service as a Veterans' Administration hospital, while maintaining its standard of medical excellence. When, in 1955, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts took over the hospital's administration with the idea of concentrating on geriatrics, a new chapter in public service began.

This new Cushing Hospital set out to provide the elderly with the best possible health care. It has remained dedicated to that goal over the years even in the face of unforeseeable challenges posed by today's world. Skyrocketing health costs and inadequate facilities to care for a fast-growing elderly population have conspired to make the goal of proper care that much more difficult. Cushing Hospital, as a public facility, has treated many patients unable to afford to go elsewhere. New technologies have opened the possibilities for longer life without addressing the question of quality of life for the elderly: At Cushing, improving the quality of life for patients becomes an integral part of comprehensive health care.

Cushing's caring staff, bright environment, connections to community organizations, and inhouse resources help the elderly pursue their interests and contribute to the community despite their medical difficulties.

The elderly comprise a higher percentage of America's population than ever before, and the percentage is growing. Right now, many elderly have no access to adequate health care, and have lost their links to the community. I hope more health care facilities will turn to the model set by Cushing Hospital, with its emphasis on improved quality of life, and I hope that Cushing's plans to reach even more elderly citizens through a network of community organizations will meet with the success that the hospital has had throughout its history of public service.●

VOLUNTARY NATIONAL SERVICE PROGRAM

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues, an article by Matthew Cossolotto on "The Draft, National Service, and the Solomon Amendment," which appeared in the January 4, 1984 Chronicle of Higher Education. Mr. Cossolotto's article challenges us to turn our attention to the larger issue at stake in the debate over the Solomon amendment—the need to reexamine the programs that affect our draft age Americans. His proposals for a voluntary national service program should serve as a useful guideline for future national debate.

The article follows:

[From the Chronicle of Higher Education, Jan. 4, 1984]

THE DRAFT, NATIONAL SERVICE, AND THE SOLOMON AMENDMENT

There has been a great hue and cry about the so-called Solomon amendment, which denies federal aid to students legally required to register for the draft who fail to show evidence of having done so.

A variety of objections have been raised against this common-sense law, offered originally last year by Rep. Gerald B. H. Solomon, Republican of New York, as an amendment to the Defense Authorization Act. Opponents contend that withholding student aid from registration resisters (you can't technically call them draft resisters since there is no draft) constitutes unwarranted federal intrusion in academe, that such action discriminates against less-affluent male college student by singling them out for punishment, and that the practical difficulties of enforcing the law impose under hardship on college campuses. The Supreme Court has agreed to review a challenge to the law, and is likely to rule in the next few months.

But federal intrusion isn't, a priori, a bad thing. When the federal government intrudes on campuses to enforce civil-rights or anti-sex-discrimination laws, only a few raise objections. And I'm not sure it's so bad to require an already privileged group of college students to register for a possible future draft in exchange for receiving federal education assistance. As for the practical problems of enforcing the law on the campuses, the regulations implementing the Solomon provision do not seem to require an extraordinary effort on the part of financial-aid administrators. In view of the confusion in the Congress and the courts about the new law, however, delaying the October 1 effective date could have helped to ease the strain.

Another line of reasoning opposed to Solomon appeared in August on the opinion page of the Christian Science Monitor. The article suggested that the Solomon amendment represents "a significant threat to academic freedom broadly construed" because it "will have the effect of allocating educational opportunity on the basis of political belief."

This is a curious argument. While it is, of course, arguable that the decision of some to resist registration can be described as a political belief, that belief surely loses much of its force considering we are now at peace, and there is no military conscription in place or even contemplated except for a national emergency. The mere granting of a political motive to registration resisters does not settle the argument. The real question is whether taxpayers are obligated to subsidize the college education of people who violate the law by failing to register.

The Solomon amendment says, in effect, that taxpayers have no such obligation. It would certainly be unreasonable to expect taxpayers to support students who refuse to register for a future draft—by any measure a minimal and unobtrusive step, which a majority in Congress agreed was necessary for our national security.

There are admittedly differing views on whether registration is, indeed, necessary for national security; but that debate has been settled. Draft registration is the law of the land.

Making financial assistance contingent on registering is a far cry from denying admission to college to people on the basis of political persuasion. Registration resisters are free to apply to and attend any college, although they could face prosecution for violating the registration law. The Solomon amendment simply says that taxpayers should not be asked to pay for the college training of those who defy the law.

What is missing in the debate about the amendment and the broader draft-registration issue is a discussion about what kind of service young people may be required to perform. Proponents of peacetime draft registration argue that it is needed to meet military manpower requirements in the event of a general mobilization. As such, registration does nothing to insure the continued viability of the all-volunteer army.

Right now, due primarily to the economic recession, recruitment and retention in the armed forces are adequate. But what will happen if the economy enjoys a sustained recovery and civilian job opportunities begin to open up? The military may again face serious difficulty in attracting young people to serve.

In the next year or two, demographic factors may conspire with a reviving economy to make the all-volunteer military an increasingly untenable proposition. In 1981 over four million Americans turned 18. By 1985 the number in that age group will decline to just over three and half million.

As the economy picks up and recruitment tapers off, there will again be calls for a return to peacetime conscription. But those calling for a peacetime draft ignore both our strong tradition against mandatory service and the fact that the military will not need simply more bodies; it will need people with the right qualifications.

The registration and student-assistance debate should be expanded to include broader questions related to national-service options. Last November, however, the House of Representatives defeated a bill to establish a short-term Commission on Voluntary Service Opportunities. By a vote of 179 to 245, the House effectively derailed this legislative attempt to stimulate a national debate about existing service opportunities and various national-service proposals.

The fact is, our government has yet to give coherent attention to the patchwork of existing programs affecting draft-age Americans. Financial aid to students, job-training programs, military recruitment, and various civilian voluntary-service programs all interact, each pulling draft-age young people in one direction and away from another. We need a forward-looking national debate on those often conflicting programs to see if they can be pulled together into a coherent whole.

My own preference is for a voluntary national service program that would reduce federal subsidies to those who do not serve, provide certain benefits only to those who do serve, and emphasize the predominant importance of military service while providing expanded opportunities and rewards for those who serve in other capacities.

Under such a program we might.

Re-establish the old GI Bill, providing for full college benefits in exchange for two years of military service.

Replace all existing federal student-aid progrms with a "national service" loan program. Only those who had completed one year of non-military service would be eligible for a below-market-rate loan to cover college expenses.

Replace public-service jobs and job-training programs with direct subsidies or vouchers to employers hiring someone who has completed at least one year of national service.

Establish a call-up order for a future draft that gives deferment priorities to those who have completed some from of service. No exemptions or deferments would be available to those who have not served. This step might encourage higher-income young people, who are indifferent to financial inducements, to participate in the national-service program.

There would also have to be a structure for certifying and implementing civilian-service programs in such areas as conservation, human services, and education both at home and abroad. The key principle should be decentralization, with local boards established to certify programs.

Private citizens and business should be encouraged to make tax-exempt contributions to finance national-service projects.

While opponents of the Solomon amendment may object to some parts of my proposal, there is nonetheless an imperative need to examine voluntary-service options before we find ourselves again contemplating a peacetime draft, with a few available alternative available to us.●

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to join again in this observance of Black History Month. I am especially proud of the celebrations planned by my State, New Jersey, and my city, Newark. Governor Kean has signed a proclamation recognizing the diamond-jubilee anniversary of the NAACP, and both he and Mayor Gibson have officially proclaimed February as Black History Month. I want to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD immediately following my remarks an article from the January 29, 1984, Newark Star-Ledger that discusses the many activities in New Jersey planned to dramatize the rich contributions of blacks to American culture and history—contributions in art, literature, music, religion, science, government, the military, business, and entertainment.

I believe that 1983 was a milestone in some respects in the chronicles of blacks in America. But it was a year, also, in which we had to continue to resist the forces of reaction who would turn back the clock on civil rights.

Among the memorable events was the rally of hundreds of thousands of us in Washington last August to pay homage to Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. We gathered to commemorate that day 20 years previous when Dr. King led us in a historic congregation, the day on which he made our country's spirits soar with his dream of what America could be.

I was privileged to take part both in that original rally when Dr. King set America on his "sunlit path of racial justice" and in the restatement two decades later of our commitment to the causes that consumed him: equal justice, equal opportunity, human rights. The latter rally demonstrated beyond doubt that the spirit of Dr. King lives on. They shot down the man, but they could not shoot down his dream, a dream that was stronger than life and more powerful than death.

Mr. Speaker, 1983 was also historic because, after a decade of struggle, we succeeded in having the Congress declare the birthday of Dr. King a national holiday to be celebrated on the third Monday of January. As an original sponsor of legislation to so honor this man, I am gratified that our long endeavor has achieved success and that all of us will have one special day to rededicate ourselves to the principles of social, political, and economic justice for all.

That such rededication will be vital to continued progress is evident. Reagan administration action and inaction in civil rights and social justice forebode dark clouds on the horizon of Dr. King's sunlit path, a path on which we have had to labor merely to mark time.

So, while there has been progress on the path to justice and equality—thanks in no small measure to the immense contributions of blacks in American history—black history is not fully writ. New black leaders continue to arise to join those who are veterans of the movement determined to use the power of politics and public office as the way to equality.

"The whole history of the progress of human liberty shows that all concessions yet made to her august claims have been born of earnest struggle," Frederick Douglass said. "If there is no struggle, there is no progress."

Mr. Speaker, those words still ring true today. We are indeed fortunate to have been deeply involved in successful battles for progressive legislation: the Civil Rights Act, the Voting Rights Act, the Fair Housing Act, nutrition and education programs, legal services, to name but a few. Today, many of these programs are under continuing attack. Earnest struggles lie ahead for us, struggles to protect our hard-won victories and struggles to resume the steady march toward equal opportunity in our society for all.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH WILL HERALD OUTPOURING OF FESTIVITIES IN JERSEY

(By Angela Jones)

Wednesday will officially mark the beginning of Black History Month festivities nationwide, and Jerseyans are busy polishing plans for the annual celebration.

This year will also commemorate the 75th anniversary of the NAACP, the nation's oldest civil rights organization, and will mark the first year of existence of the New Jersey Historical Commission.

Last fall, Gov. Thomas Kean signed a bill introduced by Assemblywoman Mildred Barry Garvin (D-Essex) that established the commission and appropriated $75,000 towards its efforts this year in studying the history of blacks in New Jersey.

Garvin noted that establishment of this official commission will add a special glimmer to this year's celebration in the Garden State.

"I'm really excited," she said. "This commission makes it a real valid Black History Month in New Jersey. "We're finding as we gather data that there are historical sites all over the state as far as blacks are concerned. I think the identification of these historic places will make people more involved and aware of our contribution."

Giles Wright, coordinator of ethnic history programs for the commission, explained that Black History Month was started as "Negro History Week" in 1926 by Carter G. Woodson, the country's first black historian.

Forty years later in 1976, The Washington, D.C.-based Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History, founded by Woodson, officially extended the event from a week to a month and replaced the word "negro" with "black."

In commemoration of the historical occasion and the diamond-jubilee anniversary of its parent organization, NAACP chapters in New Jersey will be holding special Black History Month activities throughout the year, according to state NAACP President Irene Hill Smith.

"We have been left out of the history books," Smith said. "Any occasion we have to highlight the contributions of blacks should be taken."

Smith said recent landmark events like the crowning of the first black Miss America and Miss New Jersey, coupled with the advent of a major black presidential candidate, add to the excitement of Black History Month this year.

Pierre Hollingsworth, president of the Atlantic City Chapter of the NAACP, said his organization will hold a series of events to mark the occasion, including essay contests, poetry recitations and concerts.

The statewide chairman of the NAACP's voter registration drive, Hollingsworth said he also will use the month to begin signing up 61,000 unregistered black voters in the state.

Meanwhile, Kean is scheduled to sign two proclamations next Monday in Trenton recognizing the NAACP anniversary and officially declaring February Black History Month in the state, according to Beverly Fedorko, public events coordinator for the Governor.

East Orange Mayor Thomas H. Cooke Jr. will be the featured speaker in a black history program at the East Orange Public Library on Feb. 15, according to Anthony Wilson, public relations spokesman for the city.

In Newark, events during the month will be centered around the theme, "Deep Are Our Roots: A History of Black People in the City of Newark," reported Shirley Rutherford, Black History Month chairwoman and executive director of the city's Human Rights Commission.

On Wednesday during a City Hall ceremony, Newark Mayor Kenneth Gibson will sign a proclamation officially kicking off Black History Month activities in the city.

The celebration will feature a City Hall exhibit of historical material from the archives of the Newark Public Library dating back to the 18th Century, as well as pictures and artifacts from the collections of individuals whose families are longtime residents of the city.

Gibson said the exhibit "holds a particular significance to our citizens."

"Blacks have lived and worked in Newark since at least the 1730s," the mayor said. "Perhaps one of our first black heroes was a slave named Cudjo, who fought in place of his master and was rewarded with freedom and property on High Street."

The mayor said he hopes the exhibit "will fill our residents, particularly our young people, with a new pride and awareness of the importance of Newark's black citizens."

At the Newark Museum, a Smithsonian Institution exhibit depicting the unsung contributions of black Americans to the history of aviation in this country will open Feb. 7 and run through March 4.

Entitled "Black Wings: The American Black Aviation," the display is being sponsored by the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, the Federal Aviation Administration and the museum.

Henry Henderson, who last year was appointed the first black commissioner to the Port Authority, said it is important for both blacks and whites to recognize the contributions of blacks in this field.

"Although we have lived through the growth of aviation, many of us are still not aware of the important roles that blacks played," he said.

The celebration will bring to New Jersey the two eldest daughters of slain civil rights leaders Martin Luther King Jr. and Malcolm X. Yolanda King and Attallah Shabazz will make appearances as stars in a play entitled "Stepping Into Tomorrow," a musical comedy dealing with the struggles of growing into adulthood, at Monmouth College on Feb. 28, according to Jane Schoener, director of public information for the college. The performance is scheduled for 7:30 p.m. in Pollak Auditorium on the campus, located in West Long Beach.

"Each year, (celebration of) Black History Month on the campus seems to be growing," Schoener said. "It's something the whole college community and the public can participate in."

Newark Symphony Hall will feature the play on Feb. 29 at 10 a.m. Other activities to be featured at the Broad Street theatre during the month include a one-man performance based on the writings of poet and author Langston Hughes, a presentation by the Newark Dance Theatre and concerts by jazz artist Jimmy McGriff and the North Jersey Philharmonic Glee Club.

The YWCA of Newark and vicinity will feature a series of films, concerts and workshops for children and adults, according to Bernadette Kociolek, director of marketing and communications for the organization.

Included in the YWCA's events are a documentary film on the life of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., a concert by the Arts High School Chorus and a magic show.

Actor-choreographer Geoffrey Holder will be the featured performer when Essex County College opens its Ninth Annual Black History celebration Wednesday. The 7 p.m. performance will be the first in a month-long series of guest appearances, concerts, lectures and exhibits at the school, located on High Street in Newark.

An all-day conference entitled "In that Great Gettin' Up Mornin': Religion in Afro-American, Haitian and Jamaican History" will highlight Black History Month activities at Rutgers University's Newark campus on Feb. 18.

The program will be held at the Robeson Campus Center, and will feature Dr. Vincent Harding of the Iliff School of Theology in Denver, Colo., who will deliver a lecture on "Black Religion and its Transformation of America."

Human Rights activist Dick Gregory will open Black History Month Activities for Rutgers University's New Brunswick area campuses on Feb. 1 at 8 p.m. when he delivers a lecture at the Busch Student Center in Piscataway.●

THE LAST OF THE MOHICANS

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article that appeared in the Quad-City Times on June 26, 1983, regarding Mr. Charles W. Toney.

Mr. Toney, who lived for some years in my congressional district, recently retired from Deere & Co. as director of affirmative action with 42 years of service. Mr. Toney did not begin his duties at Deere & Co. in this position. He was initially hired as a foundry worker earning $17 a week.

As the result of his dedicated, hard, and sometimes seemingly unrewarding efforts to improve and advance minorities, the employment picture for this group was greatly improved with a large number of minorities advancing to higher positions.

The position that Mr. Toney held was one that required long hours and serious dedication on his part but he somehow found the time to also become one of the foremost civil rights activists in his area, which also resulted in many gains for minorities in many other areas of involvement.

I would like to commend and applaud this dedicated, concerned individual for a job well done. His efforts should serve as an inspiration to all, young and old alike, today. The article follows:

THE LAST OF THE MOHICANS

(By John Willard)

Charles W. Toney lifted the brass figure of a foundryman from the white brick fireplace of his home overlooking Oakwood Country Club.

The sculpture is one several gifts Toney received when he retired last month as director of affirmative action for Deere & Co. It depicts a muscular man pouring molten metal out of a ladle.

Toney himself started at Deere as a $17-a-week foundry worker and rose to become the company's highest ranking black. Working your way up from the bottom like that would be impossible today, Toney said, because that old foundryman's job doesn't exist anymore.

"Today, metal castings are poured by a computer. Muscular power is out," Toney said as he studied the miniature foundryman.

"I'm the last of the Mohicans."

Toney says minorities who get ahead in businesses today will be those who can master the new technology. Education, especially in the fields of accounting and engineering, is the key. "We used to see many minorities going into the social sciences, but I feel we lost ground. You can hire only so many social workers.

"And black studies was fashionable for a while. Young people majoring in black studies had good motives, but there's no such thing as black arithmetic or black accounting."

Toney stressed the importance of science and accounting curriculums to the young blacks he met while working as Deere's affirmative action chief. When he started in the position 15 years ago, there were two black engineers in the entire corporation.

Backed by a company fully committed to increasing opportunities for women and minorities, Toney went searching for minority talent on college campuses. He scoured Deere's own ranks for promising minority workers.

Toney said blacks can be found in all areas of the corporation today. There are between 30 and 40 black engineers, two black lawyers, and 50 to 60 black first line supervisors. The company also has a black plant manager, something unheard of not long ago in the agricultural implement industry.

"I feel confident and happy that minorities are advancing. There's no doubt in my mind that Deere will have a black vice president very soon" he said.

Toney said black progress at the executive level has been slow because blacks were denied opportunities for so long. "Whites have had the advantage of attending the best schools, but now blacks are graduating with M.B.A. degrees," he said.

Another barrier, Toney said, has been management's reluctance to let blacks prove themselves.

"A good manager has to give us the same opportunity to fail as he would give to whites. All too often, everybody keeps waiting for that super black to come along."

Toney could fit the definition of a super black. A one-time magazine publisher, star athlete and the first black welder in the Quad-Cities, Toney has been breaking racial barriers all of his life.

He was born in La Crosse, Wis., and raised by his mother in Clinton, Iowa, where he excelled in sports at Clinton High School.

Despite his athletic feats, Toney wasn't allowed in Clinton's public swimming pool. The humiliating experience sparked his interest in civil rights.

Although his mother kept telling him that blacks weren't making it in industry, Toney decided to pursue a chemical engineering major at St. Ambrose College. The Depression interrupted his studies and he ended up working as a $9-a-week elevator operator in St. Louis's notorious "Hell's Half-Acre" ghetto.

After hearing that Deere was hiring, Toney returned to the Quad-Cities in 1936 and began his 42-year career with the company.

Toney took time out to work for noted civil rights activist A. Phillip Randolph in Washington, D.C. He also tried his hand at magazine publishing.

Toney and his wife, Ann, brought out their first issue of "Sepia Record" in 1944. The slick-paper magazine, featuring stories of black achievers in the Quad-Cities, predated the widely known black-achievement oriented "Ebony" by two years. "Sepia Record" folded after two issues because of lack of advertising revenue.

But Toney and Ann continued making racial breakthroughs. They won the first civil rights suit ever filed in Iowa after being refused service in a Davenport ice cream parlor.

Toney participated in a study of racial discrimination in Davenport. The survey, taken during the early 1950s by the League for Social Justice, revealed no black teachers in the city, no black firemen, no black policemen. Of 10,000 workers employed at 18 of the city's largest concerns, fewer than 175 were black.

Toney chuckled at a visitor's amazement of such facts while relaxing at his brick and cedar-ranch home in Coal Valley. He built it five years ago to be close to golfing, his favorite hobby.

With its ivory carpeting, damask-covered sofas and beamed ceilings, the home is a handsome and comfortable refuge for a man of achievement.

But Toney has no plans to spend his retirement just relaxing Teaching and consulting work are among the options he is considering.

Another task facing Toney is mastering the use of another retirement gift, a home computer. His 10-year-old grandson, a computer whiz, will be his teacher.●

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS SUPREME COUNCIL

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today as a proud member of the Knights of Columbus to share with you and the rest of my colleagues several resolutions adopted by the Knights of Columbus Supreme Council in Columbus, Ohio. I am proud of the accomplishments of the K. of C., and offer these resolutions for review by the House.

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS,
New Haven, Conn., September 19, 1983.

Hon. ROY P. DYSON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C. 20515

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE DYSON: The Knights of Columbus Supreme Council, the governing body of our society, at meeting held in Columbus, Ohio, August 2-3-4, 1983, adopted resolutions pertaining to the founding principles of our nation as they pertain to religious freedom, support of life from conception to natural death, pornography in the media and tuition tax credit. Copies of these resolutions are attached for your information. Each is self-explanatory and the Knights of Columbus seek your support in enactment and enforcement of federal legislation compatible with the ideals expressed in these resolutions.

Sincerely yours,

HOWARD E. MURPHY,
Supreme Secretary.

Enclosures.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS SUPREME COUNCIL AT MEETING HELD IN COLUMBUS, OHIO, AUGUST 2-3-4, 1983

RESOLUTION NO. 1

Resolved, That we, as Knights of Columbus, take every opportunity to remind our Congressional representatives and Supreme Court Justices of the necessity to uphold the founding principles of our Nation, and

Resolved, That all councils and assemblies be requested to petition immediately the Supreme Court and the Congress to reaffirm unequivocably that the First Amendment to our Constitution forbids separation of Church and State, since separation would violate the founding concept of Christian neutrality in that "Congress shall make no law prohibiting the free exercise of religion" and further reminding them that our Constitution mandates freedom FOR religion, rather than freedom FROM religion, and further that it is their sworn and solemn duty to uphold and defend the Constitution.

RESOLUTION NO. 2

Whereas, Fundamental rights established in all countries where the Order exists guarantee that each person is created with certain equal and inalienable rights including the right to life, and

Whereas, Because science has been unable to prove just when human life begins, reason dictates the conclusion that it begins at conception, and

Whereas, The United States Supreme Court, on January 22, 1973, swept aside state laws prohibiting abortion on demand and consigned to death millions of children yet unborn, said opinion being reaffirmed by the Court on June 15, 1983,

Whereas, the Court usurped the traditional power of each state to prohibit abortion and protect the innocent life of defenseless unborn children, thus promulgating in effect a so-called right to abortion that appears nowhere in the Constitution.

Resolved, That we, as Knights of Columbus, express our profound dissappointment at the Court's decisions, stress our continued support for life from conception to natural death, commend President Reagan for his staunch pro-life stand, call upon our duly elected representatives, to restore to the people the basic liberties that the Court has eroded, including legal protection to the unborn and to those who are unable to care for themselves.

Further resolved, That we continue to support efforts to defend human life, to implement natural family planning and to participate in ongoing activities to preserve traditional family values throughout the world.

RESOLUTION NO. 3

Whereas, the Knights of Columbus have been most active in the fight against pornography both in its printed and visual forms because such materials attack the values of the family, the soul of our society and, unless pornography is successfully eradicated, it will continue its decaying, corruptive effect on our civilization as a whole, and

Whereas, in the United States of America the President has formed a White House Working Group on Pornography to provide impetus to the ongoing fight against this evil,

Resolved, That we commend the efforts of Morality in Media, Inc. to eradicate pornography and urge all state and subordinate councils in the United States to join Morality in Media, those in Canada to join Canadians for Decency and those in Mexico to join the Alianza por la Defensa de la Familia, and thus actively support the campaign against pornography; and

Further resolved, That we commend President Reagan on the establishment of the White House Working Group on Pornography and express our support for his continued efforts to have the existing laws concerning pornography strictly enforced, and

Further resolved, That we urge the legislative bodies in each of our countries to enact strong legislation prohibiting the showing of pornographic programming on cable television.

Whereas, all persons under our democratic system of government are guaranteed free exercise of certain inalienable rights including the precious right of parents to educate their children in the school of their choice,

Whereas, the President of the United States caused legislation to be drafted to grant a tuition tax credit to parents who send their children to non-public schools, and considered this bill of such priority that he transmitted it to both houses of Congress as the first matter of business after the budget,

Whereas, the Supreme Knight has been instrumental in forming a coalition of Catholic organizations in cooperation with the United States Catholic Conference, to include the Knights of Columbus, the Catholic Daughters of the Americas, Citizens for Educational Freedom, Daughters of Isabella, National Catholic Educational Association, and the National Council of Catholic Women to engender grass roots support for this legislation,

Resolved, That we wholeheartedly endorse and support the efforts of the Supreme Knight and this coalition to gain enactment of the tuition tax credit bill known as "The Educational Opportunity and Equity Act of 1983" during this session of Congress.

Further resolved, that each Knight, individually, let his and his family's support for this legislation be known by communications with his United States Senators and Representative, and

Further resolved, That the Supreme Secretary send a copy of this resolution to President Reagan and each of the members of Congress to express our commendation to those who support this educational equity proposal and seeking earnest consideration from those who have not expressed their support.●

THE BUDGET THAT WASN'T

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, over the past 2 years, the House and the other body have repeatedly proposed to the President that we begin serious negotiations to reduce the massive budget deficits which threaten the Nation's economic recovery. Last year's budget resolution included language, proposed by the House, calling on the President to name representatives to a bipartisan panel to craft a real, long-term deficit reduction plan. We got no response. Senator DOLE made a similar proposal to the President from the other body. He got no response.

While we welcome the President's offer to negotiate—finally—in his state of the Union address, the budget he has just proposed thoroughly undermines any faith any of us may have had in his seriousness in making that offer. I commend to my colleagues' attention the following editorial from the Washington Post of February 5:

THE BUDGET THAT WASN'T

The more carefully you look at President Reagan's budget performance, the more peculiar it gets. He has sent to Congress a budget that neither he nor anyone in his administration is willing to support. His budget director acknowledges fundamental inconsistencies, and his economic adviser assures Congress that it has no relationship to the administration's purposes: "The budget is not what we want to see happen . . ."

What do they want? A smaller deficit, they say. How? Here you get suggestions of spending cuts, unspecified. But the budget director, David Stockman, told Fortune Magazine a few weeks ago that there will be no more large spending cuts—and he is certainly right as long as defense remains untouchable. You notice that this budget itself contains no significant spending cuts. The economic adviser, Martin Feldstein, hints that there will obviously have to be a big tax increase after the election. But Mr. Feldstein is leaving that job in a few months, and there is no reason to think that he is speaking for the president.

The White House spokesman heatedly says the president reaffirms the figures as printed in the budget. But which figures? Some assume that the deficit will decline. Others say that it won't. In fact, the president is refusing to make the basic choice. Mr. Stockman incautiously suggests that the White House is waiting to hear the voice of the people in November. But suppose Mr. Reagan wins, and concludes that the voters want neither spending cuts nor tax increases. What then? The administration grins and shrugs.

Mr. Reagan says that he wants Congress to negotiate with him. His secretary of the Treasury, always a reliable indicator of political currents at the White House, chides the Democrats for not responding immediately. But what are they to negotiate on? A budget that the administration has already disavowed?

Mr. Reagan is not doing a president's job. Under American law and customs, the initiative comes from the president. The American government does not work well when the president refuses to lead.

Mr. Reagan has given no one in Congress much reason to believe that he is ready to negotiate in good faith. If he were really looking for a way to begin reducing the deficit and wanted a congressional proposal, he could seize the combination of spending cuts and tax increases drafted by Sen. Robert Dole, who has shown more courage and candor on the budget than all the administration's various quarreling factions put together. Several times over the past year Sen. Dole has called for just such negotiations between the White House and congressional leaders; the White House never responded.

Given that experience, it's hardly unreasonable for Democrats to fear that negotiations now would be merely a trap. They assume that if they were to make any serious proposal, Mr. Reagan would spring up from the table and bound around the country brandishing it as evidence that the Democrats want to raise your taxes and weaken the national defense.

But perhaps Mr. Reagan has had a true change of heart since Sen. Dole's last unanswered invitation. Perhaps he really does want genuine negotiations now with Congress. If that is the case, those negotiations will have to start with a presidential proposal and a presidential position. Mr. Reagan will have to come up with a presidential budget that he is prepared to stand behind. On the central issue of American domestic policy, he will have to start behaving like a president.●

WHOSE CHOICE?

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States gave new meaning to the term "freedom of choice" on national television a few days ago.

He said:

What we have found in this country, and maybe we're more aware of it now, is the people who are sleeping on the grates, the homeless who are homeless, you might say, by choice.

By choice?

If the President really believes that people who live on the street, sleep on heating grates and park benches, freeze their feet and their fingers, and die of hypothermia are exercising their freedom of choice—then he better think again.

Choice implies a right or privilege to choose freely. You have free choice only if you are not imprisoned by the circumstances of your existence. The homeless have no power, no options.

When a man stands on the ledge of an 18-story building and threatens to jump, would the President say the man is exercising his freedom of choice?

It is a quicker death to jump, but homelessness is the same kind of fall—it just takes longer.

When someone is too sick, too confused and too disoriented to go to a shelter for the night, it does not mean that the person is homeless by choice.

Surely the President does not believe homeless people choose to be unemployed, choose to be unable to find housing, choose to be mentally ill, choose to be alcohol- and drug-dependent, choose to be ruled ineligible for disability assistance. What kind of choices are these?

The homeless do not have the ability to choose because of the weight of extenuating circumstances. They are victims of conditions beyond their control. But not beyond the control of the President. In fact, the Reagan administration's social policies are directly linked to the miserable plight of the homeless. Instead of offering them a helping hand, the President has offered them a slap in the face.

Under the Reagan administration's policies, the homeless cannot even pull themselves up by the proverbial bootstraps—because they do not have any boots.

Last week, the Housing and Community Development Subcommittee held a 9-hour hearing in a shelter for homeless people operated by the Community for Creative Nonviolence in Washington, D.C. The shelter, a barely habitable abandoned building owned by the General Services Administration, is located just a few blocks from Capitol Hill and only 2 miles from the White House.

Thirty-seven witnesses—big and small city mayors, the Governor of New York, representatives from charitable and religious organizations, volunteers, and homeless people themselves—told the subcommittee in no uncertain terms why there are so many homeless people today, and why there is not enough being done to help them.

The answers we heard were a horrifying indictment of the Reagan leadership.

From the testimony and the subcommittee's continuing work, it is evident that there is a clear relationship between the Reagan administration policies—cutting housing assistance, cutting nutrition and food programs, cutting social spending, cutting hundreds of thousands of people off social security disability—and the increased homeless population on the streets and grates of America.

Record unemployment and the country's worst economic slump since the 1930's fell hardest on those already on the margins of society—especially, the poor, the young, and minorities. In New York City, the average age of new applicants to public shelters is 34; 7 percent are under 21. In other cities, the average age of single homeless or sheltered populations is under 40.

Across the country existing shelters are being stretched to the breaking point. Each night they turn away homeless people because all the cots or floorspace is taken.

Reagan administration budget cuts have diminished the supply of low-cost housing. More units of low-rent dwellings are lost each year through abandonment, arson, demolition or conversion. Under the Reagan administration we have not yet had a decent low-income housing program. The reality of Reagan's housing assistance cuts has caught up with our society.

Many of the people living on the street today are former patients who were released from public mental hospitals as part of the shift from institutions to community-based care. While some of the people released wound up in nursing homes or board and care homes, or even prison, many others—including some who obviously cannot take care of themselves—ended up on the street. Why? Local, State and Federal budget cuts axed the resources necessary to support these people in their communities. The severe cutbacks in Federal social programs—from counseling centers to halfway houses—meant that these former patients are being left to fend for themselves, frustrated and despairing, alone on the street.

Finally, the Reagan administration has over the past 2 years carried out an intensified, targeted effort to remove people from social security disability aid, including many qualified claimants. The latest figures show 300,000 people have lost their disability benefits. These are people who cannot work. Many have ended up in public shelters.

Since 1982, I have been advocating a national homeless program. A single piece of legislation alone would not prevent that man on the 18th floor ledge from jumping, but it could provide a net that would break his fall. Like the District of Columbia shelter which is owned by the Federal Government and operated by charitable organizations, the national homeless program we seek to establish would be built on the public and private resources we have.

Emergency shelter legislation passed the House of Representatives four times during the past 2 years. Given the administration's opposition, it is a tribute to the dedication of a small bipartisan group of Members and a small miracle that the legislation was finally signed into law last November. However, the program is an empty promise unless the Congress and the administration agree to provide the $60 million necessary to fund the program, about $30 per homeless person per year.

Ronald Reagan is old enough to remember the Great Depression and John Steinbeck's "Grapes of Wrath." Steinbeck was an eloquent witness to the frustration and indifference that grips people who have lost all hope, to homeless and hungry Americans on the move, the victims of economic circumstances that denied them any choice.

Steinbeck wrote about the hungry and the homeless this way:

A hunger in a stomach, multiplied a million times; a hunger in a single soul, multiplied a million times; muscles and minds aching to grow, to work, to create, multiplied a million times.

Would President Reagan say the people of the Great Depression were hungry by choice?

I was stung by President Reagan's unfair, insensitive and thoughtless statements about homeless people. Today's homeless deserve better from the President of this Nation.

The prophet Isaiah wrote in chapter 58, 7-10:

Thus says the Lord, Share your bread with the hungry,
Shelter the oppressed and the homeless,
Clothe the naked when you see them,
And do not turn your back on your own.

The President is the spiritual and moral leader of our country. It is pathetic that he would believe that people are homeless and desperate by choice.

OSHA RULE COUNTERS "RIGHT-TO-KNOW" LAWS

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a rule that was recently promulgated by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) which would eliminate what little public protection from toxic chemicals that exists. The rule would preempt local right-to-know laws that require industries to disclose to their workers, to their community and to public safety personnel the types of chemicals used on a day-to-day basis. These laws help make the public more aware of the dangers they face.

The new hazard communication rule proposed by OSHA leaves this very important matter entirely up to industry. The OSHA rule would require only manufacturing industries to assess the extent of danger presented by the chemicals used in their industry and then make the decision to inform the workers involved in the manufacturing process. Contrary to the right-to-know laws, the new rule does not require industries to inform the community and public safety personnel of the possible hazards and thus prevents the public from taking preventive measures and establishing effective evacuation procedures in the event of an accident. The OSHA rule furthermore places no requirements on construction, transportation, and public service industries where chemicals are widely in use. The OSHA rule thus ignores the public's right-to-know the dangers that they might be subjected to and severely hampers any efforts to minimize dangers to the community.

I would like to commend to the attention of my colleagues an article published in the Courier-Post that explains the provisions and ramifications of this rule:

FEDERAL OFFICIALS ATTEMPT TO UNDERCUT STATE AND LOCAL "RIGHT-TO-KNOW" LAWS

(By Ken Silver)

Reagan administration officials paid to protect the public from toxic chemicals have been, it seems, on a three-year vacation. But Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) officials recently worked overtime in an attempt to eliminate what little protection exists. Over the Thanksgiving holiday weekend OSHA Director Thorne Auchter issued a new federal rule which seeks to preempt state and local "right-to-know" laws and replace them with a watered-down "hazard communication" standard.

Right-to-know laws require industries to disclose the identities of chemicals they use to workers, community residents and public safety personnel. They are an attempt to lift the lid on information about chemical hazards—information which industry has long concealed under the guise of "trade secrets." Fourteen states and over 30 county, city and local governments have passed such laws.

The new "hazard communication" standard was drafted with heavy input from the chemical industry in response to the growing right-to-know movement. A much stronger hazard identification and labeling rule proposed by the Carter Administration was withdrawn by Auchter's boss, Labor Secretary Raymond Donovan, as his first official act in 1981. The chemical industry assailed the Carter rule as too costly to implement and had branded it a gross example of federal interference. But when the cities of Philadelphia and Cincinnati and the state of California passed right-to-know laws in rapid succession, the chemical industry turned to Auchter for help.

Faced with more than 50 right-to-know bills around the country, the chemical industry—almost overnight—became the strongest advocate of federal regulation.

And for good reason. The hazard communication standard issued by OSHA last week is chock full of loopholes.

The standard covers manufacturing industries only. It ignores exposure to toxic substances in public employment, in construction, in transportation and in the growing service industries. Auto body shops, railroad yards, power plants and hospitals are among the many kinds of workplaces excluded. In all, the hazard communication standard covers less than one-quarter of American workers who are exposed to toxic substances on the job.

Under the Auchter rule, employers and chemical manufacturers themselves will assess the hazards of the products they produce or use.

The rule contains no provisions for community residents, firefighters or public safety officials to gain access to information on the chemicals used, stored, transported or emitted into the air, water and soil that surround a factory.

Most disturbing is that the Auchter rule gives corporations wide discretion to conceal information considered a "trade secret." And it provides no procedures for workers to challenge the legitimacy of companies' trade secret claims.

The hazard communication standard will not fully pre-empt state and local right-to-know laws. OSHA officals publicly admit that their rule cannot pre-empt the provisions of those right-to-know laws that give community residents and public safety officials access to information. The place where federal pre-emption is a real threat is in the manufacturing sector of worker right-to-know laws.

Even so, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth District recently upheld West Virginia's right-to-know law, rejecting the West Virginia Manufacturing Association's argument that the federal government has supremeacy in the regulation of workplace hazards. And last year a federal court upheld California's right to set a limit for worker exposure to ethylene dibromide (a known carcinogen) 100 times more stingent than the federal limit, over the objections of industry representatives.

The United Steelworkers of America and several affiliated national unions have already filed suit in federal court seeking a full judicial review which would require OSHA to explain its reasons for issuing such a weak standard. The unions have vowed to wage a protracted legal brawl to fight pre-emption in the courts. Industry, for its part, will argue that state and local right-to-know laws place an undue burden on interstate commerce are unconstitutional.

In spite of these legal uncertainties, chemical industry trade publications and some newspapers are reporting matter-of-factly that the standard will pre-empt state and local right-to-know laws. Lawmakers and the general public are understandably confused. In the 20 or more state legislatures where right-to-know bills will be debated next year, industry representatives are certain to proclaim that the federal government has "solved" the problem, thereby nullifying the need for state measures. Clearly, the major short-term benefit to industry from issuance of the hazard communication standard is not pre-empt, but confusion.

It is shameful indeed when our government works to keep its citizenry ignorant and confused, under the guise of allowing industry to protect trade secrets. It is high time for government to recognize that trade secrecy is a privilege—not a right—which society bestows upon private corporations for the limited purpose of promoting economic growth and production. Society must drastically limit that privilege when it encroaches on the inalienable rights of citizens to safe and healthy workplaces and communities.

The Reagan administration's failure to protect Americans from toxic chemicals and hazardous wastes is nothing new. The politicized quagmire of toxic secrecy into which President Reagan's EPA appointees sank a year ago appears to have finally swallowed Mr. Auchter whole as well.

The limp, loophole-ridden regulation issued by Mr. Auchter may as well be renamed the "right-to-snow." It is yet another reason why states, cities, counties and towns should enact strong laws for full disclosure of chemical hazards in the workplace and in the community.●

BUDGET REDUCTION FOR GALLAUDET COLLEGE

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, while I will be joining my colleagues in the Congressional Black Caucus in developing the CBC alternative budget for fiscal year 1985, I want to take this opportunity to address a specific budget proposal. Gallaudet College is located in the District of Columbia, but the budget proposal for the Nation's only postsecondary education institution for deaf persons will, if enacted, negatively affect virtually every Member's district.

President Reagan's fiscal year 1985 budget proposes an $11 million reduction in the budget for Gallaudet's Model Secondary School for the Deaf (MSSD) and the Kendall Demonstration Elementary School (KDES). To recover this reduction, the budget proposes that Gallaudet charge local school districts for the tuition and expenses of children from those districts attending MSSD and KDES.

Mr. Speaker, the proposal presents local education agencies with a very difficult budget decision. Moreover, parents may be forced to forego this educational opportunity for their children because neither they nor their local school district can pay the tuition costs.

These programs currently serve 601 students in 34 States, territories, and the District of Columbia. The issue of fairness certainly pertains to this budget proposal—it is unfair.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have had the opportunity to cosign a letter to President Reagan, along with my colleagues, Mr. Bonior who is a member of Gallaudet's Board of Trustees, Mr. Perkins and Mr. Murphy. We have urged President Reagan to reconsider this unfortunate proposal. Short of his reconsideration, I urge my colleagues to oppose this budget proposal and to make their opposition known to the White House and members of the Budget and Appropriations Committee.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR

OF NEW YORK

Wednesday, February 1, 1984

● Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my voice to those of my colleagues in commemorating Ukrainian Independence Day. The short experience with freedom that the Ukrainians enjoyed ended all too abruptly at the hands of a ruthless Soviet army. Ukrainians around the world show that they desire to enjoy again this freedom by commemorating this day.

Americans see the world as a large community, and when a member of that community is struck by natural disaster, Americans respond compassionately. When a member of the world community is victimized by brutal force or senseless violence, Americans react with shock and alarm. KAL flight 007, the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II, and the Soviet role in Afghanistan, Hungary, and Eastern Europe serve to remind us in Congress that the American people become angered when the community rules of decency and civility are violated.

These recent examples, however, cause some to lose sight of the past travesties like the Soviet annexation of the Ukrainian people, land and culture. Over 7 million Ukrainians died of starvation during 1932–33 because of Stalin's collectivization programs. The Ukrainian people stood steadfast in their opposition, yet faced deportation or execution if found in noncompliance. Though this horrifying loss of life occurred 50 years ago, it stands as one of the most calculated examples of imposing by force the will of one nation upon that of another.

The Ukrainian people still yearn to regain their freedom. This struggle is not easy, yet the Ukrainians in the Soviet bloc enjoy the strong support of the compatriots abroad and of the American people who seek the goal of a world community where human rights and freedom are protected and available to all.●

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

Wednesday, February 1, 1984

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, 66 years ago, on January 22, 1918, the Ukraine declared itself independent and free. A scant 3 years later that declaration was nullified, not by choice, but by the crush of a powerful Red Army. Sadly enough, this victory of might over right was only the beginning of a drawn-out nightmare for the Ukraine.

Torture and terror are no strangers to the 50 million people in the Ukraine. Nor is forced starvation which has taken the lives of millions. The privation and suffering imposed on these Ukrainians, living under the heavy hand of the U.S.S.R., testifies to the horrifying capacity of man to wreak havoc on his fellow man.

The bright spot in this tale of oppression stems from Charles Péguy's remark that "Freedom is a system based on courage." If this is true, then those who live in the Ukraine are in a significant sense free, despite living under the looming shadow of the U.S.S.R., for those who live in the Ukraine are truly a courageous people. It is heartening to know that despite all efforts to eradicate the culture and traditions of this area, Ukrainian culture and traditions survive and flourish.

The courage of the Ukrainians fills me with a measure of awe and a great hope. It is my hope that in the years to come Congress will stand in this very room to celebrate an enduring political freedom for the Ukraine.●

CRAFTED WITH PRIDE IN AMERICA

HON. C. ROBIN BRITT

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. BRITT. Mr. Speaker, in this age of increasing competition from foreign markets, strong efforts must be made to strengthen and promote our domestic textile industry.

Hopefully, trade law reform will be high on the legislative agenda this year. During the 1st session of the 98th Congress, I cosponsored H.R. 4124, the Comprehensive Trade Law Reform Act, which is designed to strengthen our trade laws by eliminating loopholes that allow dumping of foreign products and streamlining appeals procedures when violations occur.

I am also cosponsoring a bill, H.R. 4643, that enforces a labeling requirement imposed to let American consumers know whether a product is American made.

Recently one of my constituents sent me a poem that I feel captures the feelings of American textile workers concerning their current plight. "Crafted With Pride In America" was written by Mrs. Johnnie Busick, a tufting creeler who has been employed by Burlington House of Burlington, N.C. for over 30 years.

Mrs. Busick's poem communicates the dilemma facing the domestic textile industry and the reasons we, as elected officials, must do all we can to insure that our textile and apparel manufacturers have the chance to compete on a level playing field—not one that is tilted toward imports. What I hear from the textile manufacturers in my district is not a demand for protectionism, but merely a call for fair trade.

I hope Congress will keep Mrs. Busick's poem in mind when considering foreign trade legislation this year.

Following is the text of "Crafted With Pride In America," by Mrs. Busick:

Crafted With Pride In America
Made through knowledge and skill
Crafted with pride we inherited
That past generations instilled.

We are a people of great endeavors
Our accomplishments great and small
We started this nation with nothing
Then made life better for all.

Products of every nature
Have been made by our skillful hands
Reflecting the pride and genius
Throughout our God-given land.

Other nations have watched us and listened
And learned from the lessons we taught
And now as we watch they're stealing
The freedoms for which we have fought.

Foreign-made textiles and products
Keep flowing into our land
Loss of our jobs and our money
Even now makes idle our hands.

Stop now and look for a moment
At the treasure we're about to lose
We are the ones who can change it
It's ours to keep if we choose.

Let us all buy what we make in America
So America can lead once again
We're a people of great productivity
Let's fight this battle and win.

Crafted with pride in America
Let's always strive to stay number one
Crafted with pride in America
The greatest land under the sun.●

THE ANSONIA CHARGERS: CROWNING A WINNING TRADITION

HON. WILLIAM R. RATCHFORD

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call the attention of my colleagues to the extraordinary accomplishments of the Ansonia Chargers, the best high school football team in the State of Connecticut.

Ansonia High School may be one of the smallest high schools in Connecticut, but only if one judges by nunbers and square feet. In the realm of sport, the school is surely a giant. The heart and drive and effort of this school and its football team can really only be measured by looking at their deeds, accomplishments that stand unmatched anywhere in the State.

The Chargers are consistently one of the State's finest and are the only high school team to make the State playoffs every year since 1976 when the current system began.

This year, the Chargers earned an 11-0 record, including a 32-0 victory in the class S championship. In addition, the Chargers led the Naugatuck Valley League, a league in which football rivalries are legendary.

Mr. Speaker, I attended several of the Charger's games this year, as I do every year, and I can personally attest to the winning tradition of the Chargers. Coach Bill McAllister and his assistants John Hunt, Jim DellaVolpe, John Sponheimer, Bob Lisi, and Frank Colandro all deserve special mention for their dedication, and for the professional way in which their players conduct themselves. The Charger players also deserve the accolades they have earned for their mastery of the game and the way in which they have dominated their opponents.

I am not suprised that Connecticut sportswriters named the Chargers the No. 1 high school football team in the State. They are No. 1, and it is not a distinction that they will relinquish easily. I am sure that the Ansonia High School Chargers will be a power to be reckoned with for a long time to come.●

McKITTRICK RUNNERS BEAT ODDS

HON. WILLIAM M. THOMAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, very few people outside of Kern County have heard of the town of McKittrick, Calif., but recently some young constituents from McKittrick succeeded in putting their town on the map. This group of young athletes attained national excellence against huge odds.

On December 12, 1983, six girls from McKittrick Elementary School traveled to the AAU National Cross-Country Championships. Teams from across the Nation competed at this event, in hopes of becoming one of the top teams in the Nation.

The runners for the McKittrick Westside Track Club—Amy Mabon, Jennifer Yeates, Kristen Phillips, Mary Mabon, Amber Collins, and Shawna Walters—placed third in the Nation in this event. This feat in itself is commendable, but this club had other odds to battle as well. Led by Coach Ken Mabon, the Westside Track Club competed against schools and clubs many times the size of their school—in fact, larger than the entire town of McKittrick. The six runners represented almost the entire fourth and fifth grades of McKittrick Elementary School, which has a total enrollment of 40 students. Yet, with perseverance, dedication, and talent, the Westside Track Club rose to national excellence.

Mr. Speaker, these girls and their coach deserve the highest commendation for their tremendous efforts and achievements, and I am tremendously proud of them.●

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI ON THE U.S. MARINES IN LEBANON

HON. JAMES M. SHANNON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, on January 7, 1984, my colleague from California, Mr. MATSUI, delivered an excellent radio address that explored the question of U.S. Marine forces in Lebanon. After examining the situation there closely as part of the monitoring group on Lebanon, Mr. MATSUI believes it is again time for Congress to consider our objectives in Lebanon, and whether they are realistic ones. I would like to submit his thoughtful speech on the subject, knowing it will help us as we begin to address this issue.

Also included is an article from the New York Times:

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

Good afternoon. This is Congressman Bob Matsui from California. We have just heard the President discuss a critical problem: the lack of discipline in our public schools. But what the President doesn't seem to understand is that this lack of discipline is only a symptom of the deteriorating state of this country's educational programs, including cuts in the school lunch program, student aid program, and the President's attempt to eliminate the Department of Education.

Today, I would like to turn to another crisis, however. We have just learned that two more marines were injured as a result of shelling around the Beirut airport. I believe it is time to bring our marines home from Lebanon. Not tomorrow. Not at some vague distant date. But now.

For the truth is, the President's ill-conceived and ill-defined Middle East policies have more than failed; they have turned deadly.

While I supported our marines' role as initially defined—to give the Lebanese government time to restore its shattered nation—we are now seen by too many people as just another Middle East faction. Our role has turned from neutral peacekeepers to participants in the internal struggle. The marines have no useful role in helping to bring the warring factions together. Worse yet, so long as the marines remain, we risk a direct confrontation with Syrian and Russian troops.

So long as all factions in Lebanon accepted our marines as neutral peacekeepers, they had some chance of promoting a permanent solution. But it has become painfully clear—with the recent bombing of our marine barracks and frequent shelling of our troops—that we are no longer a peaceful influence. We are a lightning rod for terrorism.

We should not be perceived as cutting and running from Lebanon because of the bombing of the marine barracks. That would send a signal that America can be intimidated, but we cannot be. We all recognize the strategic importance of the Middle East, and we must always be prepared to use military force to protect our interests in that region.

But today, our military response to terrorism has plunged us into a storm of escalating violence. I believe we can calm that storm and further the peace process by withdrawing our troops from Lebanon.

If you sit and think about it for just a moment, we have only two alternatives. We can continue as we are now, taking sides in a conflict that is not ours and playing an active military role. This can ony escalate the conflict and bring us dangerously close to a Soviet-American confrontation. Or, we can work toward a diplomatic solution that all parties—including the Lebanese and the Syrians—can embrace.

Just this week, we witnessed a bold diplomatic effort which brought one of our men home, Navy Lieutenant Robert Goodman. Lieutenant Goodman's release revealed that personal diplomacy can make a difference. He was not released by gun ships and war planes but by calm discussion.

A recent Pentagon report, written by top military experts, concluded that not only has there been gross negligence in securing the safety of our marines, but also that our mission there is inherently impossible. This is not the fault of our marines. It is the fault of this administration.

The first step toward peace is to bring our men home and defuse the hostilities in Lebanon by changing the American profile from one of a marine with an M-16 to a diplomat with a real mission.

In recent hours, we have learned of progress toward a new security arrangement in Lebanon designed to extend the control of the Lebanese government. We hope that this new proposal succeeds. This is the time for the president to use a bold diplomatic stroke to achieve a lasting peace. What we need is a sign from this president that he is serious in reaching a diplomatic solution. And the demands the participation by the secretary of state or the vice-president. Certainly, there would be political risk on the part of this president by taking such a bold move. But our brave marines are risking much more—their lives. They deserve the utmost sacrifice from this administration.

And let us not forget that moving our Marines to another area in Lebanon will not make them any safer. We all know that no place in the Middle-East is safe from a terrorist. Our men are being killed, not because of where they are, but because of who they are. Mr. President, get our people out of a war we did not create, and let our diplomats use reason, trust, and bold action to bring peace to the Lebanese people, and peace-of-mind to the families of our marines.

This has been Congressman Bob Matsui. Thank you and peace be with you.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 7, 1984]

HOUSE DEMOCRAT ASKS A PULLOUT

WASHINGTON.—Representative Robert T. Matsui, chosen by the House leadership to give the weekly Democratic radio address, called today for the immediate withdrawal of United States troops from Lebanon, saying President Reagan's "ill conceived" policies had "turned deadly."

"It is time to bring our marines home from Lebanon," the California Democrat said. "Not tomorrow. Not at some vague distant date. But now."

Mr. Matsui, a member of Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr.'s monitoring group on Lebanon, went further in advocating an immediate withdrawal than had Mr. O'Neill, after meeting with the group last Tuesday.

Mr. O'Neill had said that "patience in Congress with Administration policies in Lebanon is wearing very thin" and that "maintaining the status quo position of our marines in Lebanon is unacceptable." But he also said Democrats wanted to give Mr. Reagan an opportunity to undertake new diplomatic efforts before trying to force his hand.

In an interview today after his radio address, Mr. Matsui said the Speaker was "fully aware of my position for an immediate pullout when he asked me to speak." Mr. Matsui agreed that his own statement had gone farther than Mr. O'Neill's, but said he did not know whether the Speaker now agreed with him.

"I can't speak for him," Mr. Matsui said, referring to Mr. O'Neill. Efforts to reach Mr. O'Neill or members of his staff today proved unsuccessful.

Mr. Matsui said he believed that Lebanon would be made "the top priority" when the Congressional session opens.

"The first step toward peace is to bring our men home and defuse the hostilities in Lebanon by changing the American profile from one of a marine with an M-16 to a diplomat with a real mission," Mr. Matsui said in his address, terming the Marines a "lightening rod for terrorism."

QUALITY EDUCATION IS ALIVE AND WELL AT NEW TRIER HIGH SCHOOL

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, many Americans have grown concerned over the deteriorating quality of our public schools. I am hopeful that this educational crisis has triggered a trend toward greater expectations of our public schools, students, and teachers. Rather than focus my concern on problems, however, I would like to call attention to a school located in my congressional district which I consider to be second to no other secondary school in the country. Recently, Parade Magazine conducted a national survey on high school educators which confirmed my esteem for the New Trier school system by listing it among the top 15 high schools in the country. I hold up its tradition of success to my colleagues as an outstanding example of the best of American public education.

New Trier's long tradition of scholastic excellence is founded in its commitment to a rigorous academic program, maintained by a well-qualified faculty and supported by the parents and community. The school places emphasis on rigorous but balanced curriculum of math, science, humanities, and social sciences. These subjects are the cornerstone of a New Trier education. Moreover, the core curriculum is supplemented by new and progressive electives that allow the student to build upon the fundamentals that he or she has learned and develop creativity and imagination. Consequently, the strength and diversity of New Trier's educational programs are buttressed by traditional disciplines of the past while embracing the new ideas of the future.

Another important feature of New Trier is an advisory system that has served as a model for high schools both in Illinois and in other States. The advisory program links a teacher with 30 students in an effort to help guide them through their academic and extracurricular affairs. During the freshman year, informal visits by the adviser to the homes of each of his advisory students is encouraged. These visits help lower the barrier between parents, students, and teachers which binds the school to the home and the community, a condition which I consider to be the most important prerequisite of an excellent school. Moreover, these home visits represent New Trier's commitment to the dignity of the individual which often fosters student-teacher friendships that go beyond 4 years of high school.

The results of New Trier's commitment to excellence has placed the school in the top 15 public high schools in the Nation. In this year alone, 238 New Trier students received awards as Illinois State Scholars, 72 students were awarded National Merit Scholarships, and 7 students received the prestigious Presidential Scholar Award. Those who have qualified for the National Merit Award are among the highest in the PSAT/NMSQT test scores in the State and represent the top half of 1 percent of this year's senior class. But this is only a small part of New Trier's academic success. The math team each year ranks high during national high school competition. Furthermore, various academic clubs including biology, debate, and Latin enjoy a very high level of participation by students and teachers alike. Each year, over 90 percent of the seniors graduate and move on to higher education, a significant indicator of future success.

It is clear that New Trier's pursuit of academic achievement has been met each day for over 80 years. Strong administrative leadership and a dedicated faculty deserve great credit for New Trier's achievement. It is the parents and community that have shared the common goal of providing the best education for their sons and daughters. New Trier deserves praise for this endeavor well done.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, for many years the Asian Community Nursing Home has been a major goal of some highly dedicated, concerned, and caring people living in Sacramento, Calif. In fact, if not for the tireless commitment of these individuals and the gracious and thoughtful gift of one in particular, Mr. Angelo Tsakopoulos, it is entirely possible that this very worthwhile project would not become a reality.

Mr. Speaker, when the Asian Community Nursing Home is completed, it will be of enormous benefit and importance to Asian senior citizens. The plans are for a 99-bed skilled nursing facility designed to serve the unique needs of Asian and Pacific islanders. The facility will employ a bilingual staff and meet the special dietary needs of its patients. Moreover, patients in the home will not only receive excellent care but cultural and social support as well.

The Asian Community Nursing Home is the culmination of years of planning and work by the Asian Community Center, a nonprofit organization that has been providing special services to Asians since 1972. For the past 3 years, the nursing home has been the top priority of this group.

Mr. Speaker, when Mr. Tsakopoulos donated 3.5 acres of land to the Asian Community Center for the building of the nursing home, there became little doubt that the project was going to be a success. On behalf of the Sacramento community and Asian senior citizens, I would like to express my heartfelt thanks and appreciation to Mr. Angelo Tsakopoulos and the Asian Community Center for the tremendous service they have performed in furthering such a worthwhile project.●

ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS: A MAN FOR ALL SEASONS

HON. MICHAEL BILIRAKIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, a large part of our great American tradition has been our right to express religious belief—something which is one of the founding principles of our Nation.

This expression is manifested in several dimensions, but, perhaps the most dynamic aspect of these has been in the personalities of certain distinguished leaders.

If we were to sit and ponder for a moment, we might remember such individuals as the Reverend Jno. Witherspoon, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, Brigham Young, Elizabeth Ann Seton, Cardinal Spellman, as well as several of our own Presidents who distinguished themselves as people of deep religious belief.

And now, another individual, can be added to the list of unique and respected leaders. This person is His Eminence, Archbishop Iakovos, chief primate of the Greek Orthodox Church in the Western Hemisphere.

I could expound on the many attributes of this man of God, since I myself am a Greek Orthodox and am familiar with his accomplishments as a spiritual leader. I would, though, prefer to highlight some of the other significant qualities that are a part of his life.

For close to 50 years His Eminence has served his church and humanity, as a clergyman of the Orthodox Church. For the past 25 years he has served as spiritual leader for the Greek Orthodox faithful of the Western Hemisphere. His has been a life of commitment, dedication and sacrifice—a triad of qualities that, unfortunately, are much too rare in this day and age.

One of the most important aspects of the ministry of Archbishop Iakovos is his activity in the ecumenical movement. His successful strides to overcome centuries-long taboos and antiquated national customs have been an inspiration to the millions of Christians throughout the world. His efforts to reunite the segmented branches of the Christian Church have brought once-unwilling parties to the table for discussions and cooperation. He was an initiating factor in establishing the dialog that now exists between the churches of the East and those of the West—a dialog that has ended a silence of hundreds of years.

He evidenced the principles of his faith by having been in the forefront of the civil rights movement, as he marched with the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. in Selma, Ala. in 1965. By doing this, he reaffirmed the words of the Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created equal." His efforts in behalf of human rights has not been limited to his mission in the United States. In 1974, when the island of Cyprus was invaded by Turkey, Archbishop Iakovos initiated a massive national campaign to assist the innocent Cypriot victims. Since that time, he has been outspoken against the policies of Turkey and, because of this boldness in the name of justice, he is considered as "persona non grata" in that country.

Archbishop Iakovos has been the recipient of many awards and honors, in cluding the Presidential Medal of Freedom, and has been named "Clergyman of the Year" and also "Man of the Year" by several national organizations.

April 1 of this year will mark the 50th anniversary of his entry into the Orthodox clergy and it will also be the 25th anniversary of his enthronement as Archbishop of the Western Hemisphere. Today he offers the invocation in the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate, an honor that he has rightly earned, and I would say that he does us an honor in so doing.

As we enter the new year and this second session of the 98th Congress, I am proud to recognize the wonderful and giving life of Archbishop Iakovos and certainly hope that my colleagues will join in the many ceremonies and tributes in his honor.●

DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE OF VICTIMS OF THE HOLOCAUST

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a House concurrent resolution which would authorize the rotunda of the U.S. Capitol to be used on April 30, 1984, for a ceremony commemorating the Days of Remembrance of Victims of the Holocaust.

Historically the rotunda has been used to fortify the memory of those whose lives, and deaths, have had resounding impact—unknown soldiers from World War I, World War II, and the Korean war have lain in state in the rotunda.

It therefore seems particularly appropriate that the Holocaust Commission commence its days of remembrance in the rotunda, a space which has become a symbol of those whose deaths we must remember to insure that our future does not repeat our past.●

CRITICISM OF THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

HON. JOHN McCAIN

OF ARIZONA

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, the Department of the Interior, and those policies pursued by its past Secretary, have been the subject of much criticism. The press has led the attack on the Department and the former Secretary. I find nothing wrong with this. In fact, it is their role in our society to keep the public informed of the actions of their elected officials. However, it is also the responsibility of the press to insure the accuracy of their reporting.

It is because of this responsibility, which the press usually attempts to fulfill, that I was shocked to learn of the irresponsibility of one of our major televison networks. I can accept occasional mistakes. But when these mistakes are repeated, even after accurate information is made available through the congressional hearing process, they become unacceptable. I have included below a recent article from the American Legal Foundation which elaborates on this incident.

Prime-time investigative documentaries have given muckraking new respectability, but that respectability is facing legal accountability. Not only are media victims, such as General Westmoreland, taking the media to court, but media watchdog groups such as the American Legal Foundation (ALF) are aggressively exposing media bias. ALF, for example, recently dragged NBC before the Federal Communications Commission charging NBC deliberately falsified the news, misled the public and distorted the truth in a "Monitor" segment which accused the Interior Department under former Secretary James Watt of not enforcing stripmining reclamation laws.

The "Monitor" segment was broadcast twice. Between the broadcasts the Interior Department's Office of Surface Mining (OSM) sent NBC a twenty-three page critique of the segment and Congressional hearings were held which produced testimony vindicating the Interior Department. But NBC went ahead with the second broadcast without acknowledging any errors or inaccuracies. Here are some of the more blatant misstatements ALF's Complaint points out to the FCC:

The program was devoted to developing Lloyd Dobyns' opening statement: "[T]he government—and that's you and me—is owed a great deal of money from stripmining and the Interior Department is doing next to nothing about collecting it."

But OSM's critique of the first broadcast described in detail the extensive efforts made by the Department to enforce the reclamation laws. These efforts included development and implementation of a plan for assessing penalties against those mining companies which had violated failure to abate cessation orders, the use of Dunn and Bradstreet to collect reclamation fees, pursuance of other expeditious enforcement actions, and the referral of all unpaid penalties to the Interior Department Solicitor for the filing of civil collection suits. In a reply to OSM's critique NBC explicitly acknowledged OSM's actions "to correct and strengthen the collection efforts."

Yet NBC with full knowledge of these efforts rebroadcast the accusation that the Interior Department was "doing next to nothing to collect unpaid fines."

In the August rebroadcast Dobyns stated: "[T]he Office of Surface Mining told Congressman Morris Udall's committee that it had issued 1700 orders to mining companies to stop illegal activities. Not one has stopped. And the Interior Department has done nothing about it."

But OSM informed NBC prior to the rebroadcast that during the Udall Subcommittee hearings, James Harris, Director of OSM, testified OSM had issued 3,500 cessation orders during the course of its existence and that the violations set forth in only 1700 of these orders remain unabated. Harris' testimony also described the steps Interior had taken to abate the 1700 remaining violations. These steps included denying permits to operators having unabated violations, granting almost $200 million to the states during 1983 to reclaim abandoned mines, initiating litigation against mine operators who failed to abate their violations, and obtaining injunctions against recalcitrant mine operators. NBC acknowledged it was aware of the efforts described in this testimony by its specific reference to the testimony in the August 6th broadcast.

Dobyns stated in both broadcasts: "[T]he regulations can't be kept going because they aren't going now. They're on the books but they're not enforced."

Three people, one of whom accused the Department of "fraud" for not pursuing violators, then stated that the non-enforcement problems started with the Reagan administration. But NBC knew an October 1979 evaluation prepared by OSM's Division of Planning and Evaluation Systems under the Carter administration had found: "At the present time, no effort is being made to assess penalties that accumulate on a daily basis. No effort is being made to collect these penalties because, the Assistant Director, Inspection and Enforcement, believes that: (1) the penalties are excessive; (2) are unlikely to be collected; and (3) do not fit the circumstances of most violations.

"Additionally, the Assistant Director also believes that daily penalties do not serve the intended purpose of getting operators to abate because in his opinion, operators know OSM would never be able to collect."

NBC also knew that since September 1982 Dunn and Bradstreet had collected more than $1.3 million and that Interior Department under Watt collected about $330 million annually in reclamation fees which represents in excess of 98 percent of the fees owed.

NBC, as owner of several television stations, is answerable to the Federal Communications Commission for violations of Commission policy and rules. Accurate investigative reporting is a healthy expression of the First Amendment, but when that reporting, as in this case, is not supported by facts it becomes a vicious tool for those of the media elite who seek to push their political agenda in the guise of objective reporting.●

U.S. AID TO EL SALVADOR: A TRAVESTY

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, the House is considering today the President's certification that the Government of El Salvador is making progress with regard to respect for human rights and certain political and economic reforms. This is an issue that has long concerned me and that I want to make a few comments on as we address the question of continued U.S. military assistance to El Salvador.

I am very concerned about what happens to U.S. aid to El Salvador. I have long suspected that much of it does not go to help the people of that small, beleaguered country but that it, instead, goes to line the pockets of businessmen and El Salvador officialdom. Now my suspicions are confirmed.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House an article that appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer on January 22, 1984, that describes in detail the use of dummy companies and falsified economic documents to siphon U.S. economic aid to El Salvador into the private bank accounts of El Salvador businessmen. This is absolutely outrageous. The United States is ostensibly trying to help the Government and people of El Salvador to preserve their freedom. The corruption the Plain Dealer documents is contrary to our avowed aims.

With the U.S. budget deficit growing larger and larger each year, it is inexcusable that the administration tolerates the corruption and waste described in the article. The article raises very serious questions that this body should closely examine as it debates whether to approve the President's certification that El Salvador is making progress in preserving human rights and undertaking required economic reforms.

Following is the article:

SCAMS UNDERCUT U.S. AID TO SALVADOR

(By Amos A. Kermisch)

WASHINGTON.—Through the use of dummy companies and falsified documents, U.S. economic aid to El Salvador often ends up right back in America—in the private bank accounts of Salvadoran businessmen.

Since at least 1981, officials at the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID), which dispenses the money, have been concerned enough to insist that the Salvadoran Central Bank take steps to stop the transfer of funds.

A little-noticed 1982 audit of bank procedures by AID's inspector general said "no concrete actions" had been taken. A 1983 review by the inspector general found little improvement.

A confidential study by the accounting firm of Arthur Young & Co. for AID cited the tranfers as a problem.

This hypothetical example shows how the scam works:

A Salvadoran businessman applies to the Central Bank to import fertilizer. When the application is approved he buys $100,000 in fertilizer in the United States through a dummy U.S. corporation.

The dummy corporation inflates its invoice, perhaps by 20%, and sends it to the businessman. The invoice, which now says the fertilizer cost $120,000, is given to the bank. The businessman buys U.S. dollars with Salvadoran colones at 2.5 colones to $1, and the U.S. funds are forwarded to the dummy company in payment for fertilizer.

Once the money is in the hands of the dummy U.S. corporation, $100,000 pays for the fertilizer while $20,000 goes into the Salvadoran's private bank account.

Exactly how much of the $429 million granted to El Salvador by AID since 1979 has been siphoned off is unclear, but William C. Goodfellow of the Center for International Policy, who was in El Salvador studying AID programs, said the fact that it's happening "is common knowledge."

Highly favorable exchange rates at the Central Bank are one reason U.S. funds are attractive to Salvadorans. Businessmen dealing with the bank obtain dollars at 2.5 colones to the $1. In the United States the rate of exchange quoted by one dealer last week was 4.75 colones to $1. The street rate in El Salvador is about 4 colones to $1.

To qualify for U.S. economic support funds, El Salvador was required to guarantee it would spend a like amount in colones to restore public services destroyed in the civil war. The funds are used for job programs, housing, land reform, family planning and credit to Salvadoran businesses.

In many instances the Salvadorans fall short of projected goals in supporting these programs, the inspector general's audit found.

"There is great incentive to get the money out of there and very little incentive to keep it there," said Goodfellow.

Some AID officials, however, said questionable transfers are rare. "We have audited that program several times, we have done spot checks and we have found no significant problems," said an AID official in the U.S. embassy in San Salvador. "It's this very system of controls that makes it difficult to engage in capital flight."

AID required the Central Bank to establish an internal price-checking unit to identify inflated invoices and reject them. But the effectiveness of the unit has been questioned. An audit by AID's inspector general found that in 1982 the bank approved 73,268 import transactions.

Only 112 (0.15%) were reviewed by the three-man price-checking unit. Of those, 20% were based on inflated invoices.

The audit found Salvadoran control so weak the bank was operating without a complete price list of key imports needed for price verification.

A February 1982 review by AID officials found that $4.5 million in bank-approved transactions may have been overpriced by 15% to 20%. These transactions were rejected by U.S. officials.

The confidential Arthur Young study came to similar conclusions, sources said, and made a number of suggestions for improving Central Bank operations. At least some of these recommendations, including a computerized price-checking system, are to be adopted.

With Henry Kissinger's commission suggesting last week that $8.4 billion more in economic aid go to Central America, the intensity of the debate over the use of U.S. tax dollars, particularly in El Salvador, is sure to increase.

At least one congressional committee is reviewing the use of U.S. funds throughout Central America.

But Congress has concentrated its oversight on military aid to El Salvador, while administration economic aid requests have sailed through Congress easily. For instance, Congress approved the requested $195.5 million for economic aid in fiscal 1984, but cut by nearly 25% a request for $86.3 million in military assistance.

From the end of World War II until 1979, total U.S. aid to El Salvador was only $263.5 million. In the four years since then it has leaped fourfold to $1.1 billion, making El Salvador the third-largest recipient of U.S. largesse. President Reagan is expected to seek another $400 million in military aid over the next two years.

Without the injection of U.S. grants and long-term loans there is little doubt the Salvadoran economy would have collapsed. From $750 million to $1.5 billion has been transferred out of the country during the past five years by wealthy Salvadorans fearful of a Communist takeover, U.S. and Salvadoran officials estimate.

The guerrillas have sought to destroy the Salvadoran economy. Violence has cut electricity, closed factories, disrupted business, interrupted transportation, undermined farm production and dislocated thousands of rural families.

AID policy is to stabilize the economy by maintaining imports, underwriting employment, rebuilding roads, bridges and public utilities and supporting social programs such as land and judicial reforms.

Very little U.S. money is used to help more than 400,000 people displaced by the fighting, many of whom live in refugee camps.

"We don't want camp life to become so attractive that people will not want to go back home," an AID official said.

AID officials said the country's gross national product, which has declined 25% since the civil war began in 1979, stabilized in 1983 and may show some growth.

"That's the bottom line," said the senior AID official in the U.S. embassy in El Salvador.●

SECONDARY MARKET FOR SBA GUARANTEED LOANS

HON. HENRY J. NOWAK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. NOWAK. Mr. Speaker, dramatic changes are taking place in the capital markets of this country. We are in the era of bank deregulation, the so-called nonbank bank, and the financial services supermarket. These revolutionary changes should have a dramatic impact on the way smaller firms meet their debt and equity capital needs.

With these dynamic changes occurring in the financial markets, it is the responsibility of the Congress and the administration to insure that small business continues to have access to debt capital at reasonable cost. Based on that premise, I am introducing H.R. 4773, legislation to facilitate a vibrant secondary market for the SBA guaranteed loans. Joining me as original cosponsors on the bill are Representatives LYLE WILLIAMS, PARREN J. MITCHELL, BERKLEY BEDELL, CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH, DENNIS E. ECKART, TOM J. VANDERGRIFF, DAVID DREIER, BUDDY ROEMER, IKE SKELTON, JOHN J. LAFALCE, JAMES R. "JIM" OLIN, and C. ROBIN BRITT.

OBJECTIVES OF THE LEGISLATION

My legislation utilizes the basic SBA guaranteed loan program as its foundation. Authorized by section 7(a) of the Small Business Act of 1983, the guaranteed loan program enables commercial lenders to make long-term loans to smaller firms that otherwise might not be available. Through the 7(a) guarantee loan authority, small businesses have received over $12.4 billion in financing over the past 5 years. In fact, a recent General Accounting Office report states:

> The SBA's 7(a) loan program fills a worthwhile niche in assisting many new and existing small businesses to meet their credit needs and thereby provide jobs.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Tax, Access to Equity Capital, and Business Opportunities, I held hearings on September 28, 1983, evaluating the operations of the secondary market for SBA guaranteed loans. Administration witnesses and representatives from the banking and securities industries testified at those hearings on the significance of a vibrant secondary market to the 7(a) program.

Based on that hearing and further investigation by my subcommittee, today I am introducing H.R. 4773. The legislation does not create any new Government programs. Instead, it merely provides for certain technical improvements in the operations of an existing division of the SBA, the Office of Secondary Market Operations. In essence, my bill recognizes the integral relationship of the secondary market to the 7(a) guaranteed loan program.

My legislation is being introduced today with two objectives in mind. First, it is designed to increase the flow of capital to the small business community. Second, it should encourage a lowering of the cost of borrowing to smaller firms.

THE OPERATIONS OF THE SECONDARY MARKET

In operation since 1972, the secondary market enables lenders to sell the guaranteed portion of an SBA loan to an investor. This provides the lender with an increase in liquidity and, as a result, enables it to make further loans to the small business community. Thus, the lender is provided with the opportunity of further leveraging the amount of debt capital available to small business in the marketplace. Moreover, the secondary market has encouraged lenders to make longer term and often larger loans than they could otherwise.

However, the secondary market for SBA loans is not widely utilized, nor has it reached its potential. One estimate suggests that less than 25 percent of 7(a) loans are currently sold through the operations of the secondary market. Nevertheless, this process has enabled financial institutions to increase their lending activity to small businesses by about $400 million in recent years.

My legislation would build on the inherent strengths of the current SBA program. Thus, H.R. 4773 would insure that SBA secondary market operations continue to be an integral component of the capital formation process.

In order to establish a more active marketplace, the bill would permit the pooling of SBA guaranteed loans in large homogeneous certificates. These "pooled loans" could then be offered to institutional investors in an analogous way to the operations of the secondary market for mortgages. The economies of scale of such a procedure could potentially offer the small business lower borrowing costs.

The second major provision of H.R. 4773, is designed to facilitate a more effective oversight of the SBA secondary market program itself. This provision mandates that the SBA Administrator develop such administrative procedures as are necessary for the promotion and effectiveness of the program.

For the benefit of the small business community, and of the Congress, the legislative language of H.R. 4773 is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 5 of the Small Business Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f)(1) The Administrator may, upon such terms and conditions as the Administrator may deem appropriate, guarantee the timely payment of the principal of and interest on such trust certificates or other securities as shall—

"(A) be issued by any person approved for purposes of this subsection by the Administrator, and

"(B) be based on and backed by a trust or pool composed of the portions of deferred participation loans and guaranteed loans which have been guaranteed by the Administrator under this Act or title V of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958.

"(2) Such trust certificates or other securities shall have such terms, conditions, and maturities, and bear such rate of interest, as the Administrator shall determine.

"(3) The full faith and credit of the United States is pledged to the payment of all amounts which may be required to be paid under any guarantee under this subsection.

"(4) The Administrator shall collect from the issuer a reasonable fee for any guarantee under this subsection and shall make such charges as he may determine to be reasonable for the analysis of any trust or other security arrangement proposed by the issuer.

"(5)(A) In the event the issuer is unable to make any payment of the principal of or interest on any certificate or security guaranteed under this subsection, the Admininstrator shall make such payment as and when due in cash, and thereupon shall be subrogated fully to the rights satisfied by such payment.

"(B) The Administrator may, in connection with any guarantee under this subsection, whether before or after any default, provide by contract with the issuer for the extinguishment, upon default by the issuer, of any redemption, equitable, legal, or other right, title, or interest of the issuer in any loan portion constituting a portion of the trust or pool against which the guaranteed certificates or securities are issued.

"(C) With respect to any issue of guaranteed certificates or securities, in the event of default and pursuant otherwise to the terms of the contract, the portions of the loans which constitute such trust or pool shall become the absolute property of the Administration subject only to the unsatisfied rights of the holders of such loan portions.

"(D) No State or local law, and no Federal law, shall preclude or limit the exercise by the Administration of—

"(i) its power to contract with the issuer on the terms contained in subparagraph (B),

"(ii) its rights to enforce any such contract with the issuer, or

"(iii) its ownership rights, as provided in subparagraph (C), in the portions of loans constituting the trust or pool against which the guaranteed certificates or securities are issued.

"(6) The Administrator shall develop such procedures as are necessary for the facilitation, administration and promotion of secondary market operations.●

HEARINGS ON NATIONAL CULTURAL POLICY OF THE CONGRESSIONAL ARTS CAUCUS AND THE AMERICAN COUNCIL FOR THE ARTS

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday February 4, our distinguished colleague Mr. DOWNEY, who is also the chairman of the Congressional Arts Caucus, held hearings in San Francisco on our national cultural policy. I applaud the Congressional Arts Caucus and the American Council for the Arts for organizing these hearings. The topic is an important one that deserves our thoughtful attention.

During that hearing, I submitted testimony about the National Art Bank and other issues relevant to the hearing. Since I have received a number of inquiries about the National Art Bank, Mr. Speaker, I would like to include that testimony here to inform my colleagues about the Arts Bank.

TESTIMONY OF CONGRESSMAN TOM LANTOS AT THE HEARINGS ON NATIONAL CULTURAL POLICY IN SAN FRANCISCO

Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to have this opportunity to present my views on our national cultural policy. But first I would like to thank you personally, Chairman DOWNEY, for your interest in and support for the arts. The Arts Caucus is an important institution in increasing the awareness of the Congress with regard to issues of cultural policy, and your leadership of the Caucus has been important in drawing attention to arts issues within the Federal Government. I have been a member of the Caucus since 1980 and am pleased to join with you and other members of the Congress in this effort.

I would like to commend the American Council for the Arts and the Congressional Arts Caucus for conducting these hearings. Federal government policies and activities have a profound impact upon our cultural life, and it is essential that we focus our attention on what Washington can do to enhance and stimulate our cultural activities as a nation.

The arts have always been a legitimate and important interest of our federal Government. Interest in nurturing the arts was already expressed by the statesmen who helped to establish our country. President John Adams said, "I must study politics and war, that my sons may have the liberty to study mathematics and philosophy . . . to give their children the right to study painting, poetry, and music." Our creation of the National Endowment for the Arts is a fulfillment of this traditional American goal. Many federal buildings today bear the fruits of the depression-era Government support for the arts, and the murals produced during that period are a particularly important expression of the creative American spirit.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss today a particular piece of legislation that I was pleased to introduce in the Congress last year. The bill is H.R. 2303, the National Art Bank Act, which will serve the twin purposes of carrying on the traditions established in Congress of enhancing the appearance of Federal office buildings around the country with works of art, while simultaneously stimulating activity in the arts community in all fifty states.

The Art Bank would purchase high quality art from relatively unknown artists, then temporarily distribute it for the enhancement of federal buildings throughout the country. As the experts from the Humanities Council focus interest on these artists and their art works there is every expectation that the reputation of the artist will grow as he or she becomes better known and therefore the art will become more valuable. Works purchased at relatively modest price can then be resold at a profit. The proceeds of these resales would then not only cover the original expense but could be placed in the Art Bank to be used to continue supporting other artists and encourage artistic creativity across the nation.

There are so many artists from around our country who do outstanding work, but who, due to geographical isolation or other such factors unconnected with talent, are not as well known. The Art Bank legislation would greatly benefit such artists, as well as enhance otherwise bleak environments.

A number of my colleagues in the House of Representatives have joined me in cosponsoring this important bill, and my good friend Senator Claiborne Pell introduced an identical piece of legislation in the Senate. I will continue to work in the House of Representatives for the passage of this most important piece of legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to share with you some of the programs we have sponsored in the 11th Congressional District of California to foster and encourage the arts. As public officials, I think it is our responsibility to foster and encourage artistic activity, and I have sought to do that in my District.

With the support and cooperation of the San Mateo County Arts Council, my wife and I have sponsored the Capitol Arts Program which now enters its third very successful year of bringing fine Peninsula art to the nation's capitol. Thousands of citizens from throughout the United States have had the unique opportunity to view winning entries from San Mateo County on display in our national Capitol in Washington.

As an outgrowth of my concern and respect for the rights of grandparents to have access to their grandchildren, I developed the Grandparents Arts Program. Grandparents and their grandchildren are being encouraged to participate in an art competition to display their special relationship in an artistic medium. Winners will be flown from San Francisco to Washington the Capital to see their works of art on display at the Capitol.

I am also sponsoring a program to permit children from around the nation to participate in an art competition with winning entries to be displayed here in San Francisco during the Democratic National Convention in July 1984. Artwork from each participating Democratic Congressional district will be represented. This program will give students the opportunity to define in their works and images the values of democracy and liberty upon which this country is founded.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity to offer my views and hope that the legislation which I have discussed and these other programs which foster the fine arts will be considered and publicized during the course of your hearings.●

THE EXTENSION OF THE MORTGAGE REVENUE BOND PROGRAM

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, on December 31, 1983, authority expired for States and localities to issue tax-exempt bonds to finance single-family mortgages. The failure of Congress to pass reauthorizing legislation has seriously jeopardized the availability of housing for those who may have otherwise been unable to afford it, as well as taken away one of the most effective instruments in stimulating the housing industry.

State housing finance agencies have utilized tax-exempt financing mechanisms and Federal subsidies to lower the cost of housing for low- and moderate-income families for the past 25 years. In my home State of Arkansas, the Arkansas Housing Assistance Agency, through close cooperation with lending institutions, investment banking firms, realtors, and builders, has registered strong success in fulfilling this function.

Since 1978, the AHDA has enabled thousands of low-income families to purchase or rent decent, safe, and sanitary housing by making available roughly $600 million that has assisted 11,500 households. In 1983 alone, the issuance of $200 million worth of mortgage revenue bonds generated $183.5 million in mortgages. Of that, approximately $90 million went to the construction of new homes.

Since 1979, when I testified before the House Ways and Means Committee, I have opposed actions attempting to restrict the issuance of tax-exempt bonds for housing. In the 97th Congress, I cosponsored a measure modifying some of the act's most objectionable provisions. And upon the convening of the 98th Congress, I joined with several of my colleagues in cosponsoring a bill repealing the 1980 sunset provision of the Mortgage Subsidy Bond Tax Act. Further, I introduced my own bill to outright repeal the 1980 act.

Today, I reaffirm my dedication to seeing that this invaluable program stays intact, by introducing legislation that would revive mortgage revenue bond authority for 5 years, a period of time which will provide for continuity and stability in the program's operation. Further, this legislation assures continued congressional review of the program and allows adequate time for a controlled demonstration of mortgage bonds and alternative mortgage cost reduction mechanisms.

I urge my colleagues to insist that speedy action be taken on this legislation. And although a 5-year extension is contained in the Tax Reform Act, I do not think this invaluable program should be held hostage to a large tax bill, one that has already been rejected once by this body due to objectionable provisions.

Experience with the bonds since 1980 has demonstrated the soundness of the legislative improvements and the continued effectiveness of the bonds in lowering homeownership costs. Studies by the General Accounting Office and the Congressional Budget Office have examined the bonds' operation closely.

In a 1983 GAO study, it was reported that in the first 6 months of 1982, when mortgage rates were at record highs, mortgage bonds still served a majority of lower income buyers. Seventy percent of State borrowers and 64 percent of local borrowers had incomes below 120 percent of the median. The CBO found that most States and cities it reviewed had imposed income limits on borrowers, in some cases as low as $16,000, in efforts to assure the greatest possible participation by low- and moderate-income home buyers.

The Arkansas Housing Development Agency has reported that of the $183 million in available mortgage money, 21 percent of the borrowers had family income below $19,999 a year. This figure roughly corresponds to the 1983 Arkansas median family income of $19,737.

Further, mortgage bonds' cumulative economic impact is impressive. Each $1 billion in mortgage bonds provides financing for some 7,000 new homes and for an additional 14,000 existing units, generates 7,500 jobs and $140 million in wages, and results in $62 million in Federal, State, and local taxes.

Most important of all is the continuing need for mortgage revenue bonds. Through the rest of the 1980's, the rate of household formation is expected to rise to new levels. Other Federal homeownership incentives, including tax deductions for mortgage interest and property taxes, are insufficient to lower homeownership cost to affordable rates.

Mortgage bonds can assist in offsetting cuts in Federal housing assistance for low- and moderate-income persons. As Federal assistance continues to dwindle, State and local government are faced with growing responsibility for meeting housing needs. Mortgage bonds are one of the few tools for direct housing assistance at the State and local level. Further, mortgage bonds give State and local governments greater flexibility than federally constrained programs to respond to the diversity of local and regional needs.

The continuing use of tax-exempt bonds for mortgage programs will offer vital assistance to first-time homebuyers, those who otherwise would be forced to rent, and to help strengthen the effective, self-supporting State and local housing agencies across the Nation.

DEATH SQUADS AND HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, by rejecting the Kissinger Commission's recommendation that Salvadoran aid be linked to human rights progress, the President has assured the rightwing death squads that they need expect no U.S. obstructions to their large scale acts of barbarism.

Over 30,000 Salvadoran citizens have been murdered by rightwing death squads since President Reagan took office. One in four Salvadorans has been displaced. It is impossible to calculate how many of these persons have sought refuge in the United States because they have no faith in their own government's ability or willingness to protect them.

Despite the obvious dangers of their return to El Salvador, the INS is deporting Salvadorans at the steady rate of about 350 a month. Of the 2,914 Salvadoran refugees who filed for asylum with the Immigration Service in fiscal year 1983, only 71 received it.

As long as the Salvadorans in this country face grave dangers at home, the United States is morally bound to offer them shelter until their return would be safe.

In an urgent message to the President in last week's Washington Post, the Southern California Interfaith Task Force on Central America pleads for humanitarian consideration of the Salvadoran refugees. In addition to its broader recommendations on Central American policy, it urges the adoption of H.R. 4447, introduced by Representatives JOE MOAKLEY and JOEL PRITCHARD, to allow Salvadorans to stay in the United States until after the administration studies what their fate would be if forced to return.

I am inserting the task force's message into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for every Member's consideration.

AN URGENT MESSAGE TO PRESIDENT REAGAN FROM HIS SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA NEIGHBORS

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We watch with growing disbelief and horror as, step by step, this country moves deeper into the affairs of Central America. The Kissinger Commission now asks us to become massively committed to a policy which has already failed, and which condemns the people of Central America to increased suffering. We must not destroy Central America in order to save it.

We hear the same old arguments. When will we learn that wars are easier to start than to stop?

One billion dollars in aid has been poured into El Salvador during your Administration. Daily we spend over $2 million in Central America. Now the Kissinger Commission recommends spending $8 billion there in the next 5 years. We currently are actively financing the sabotage of the economy and the government of Nicaragua.

What do we have to show for our investment so far? Close to 1 million Salvadorans have fled to refuge or exile—20 percent of the population. Over 36,000 political murders of noncombatants, almost all by government related forces. In Guatemala, government repression has terrorized the population and over 1,100,000 have fled their homes. In Southern California we now have over 300,000 Central American refugees.

We say "enough"! We refuse any longer to stand silent witness to this betrayal of American decency and humanity.

We urge you to:

(1) Halt all U.S. military aid, show of force, covert operations and internvention in Central America;

(2) Reject the Kissinger Commission's emphasis on immediate aid for a military victory in El Salvador while playing down the possibility of a peaceful political solution. Instead, take the first steps to implement the peace initiatives proposed by the Contadora Group (Venezuela, Colombia, Mexico and Panama) for a negotiated political solution among all parties to the Central American conflict;

(3) Grant temporary asylum to Central American refugees until they can safely return to their homelands.

In particular, support S. 2131 and H.R. 4447 which call for a two to three year suspension of deportations of Salvadorans while a study on human rights conditions for returnees is conducted by you and considered by the Congress.

We request the opportunity to meet with you when religious leaders gather in Washington on March 19th and 20th to pray and witness for peace, justice, and self-determination in Central America.●

THE RUSH TO MISJUDGMENT ON CRIME

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives' Committee on the Judiciary will study with respect and care the crime bill enacted by the other body. But, as suggested in the below set forth editorial in the February 6, 1984 of the New York Times, the committee will "stick to measures that really fight crime."

THE RUSH TO MISJUDGMENT ON CRIME

A Senate eager to make an election-year display of fighting crime passed a 387-page measure last week. The Senate should have been content with the bill's laudable attempts to make sentencing more fair and uniform, to ease the confiscation of criminals' assets and to make additional Federal properties available to state prisons. Instead, it rode pell-mell over the Constitution by sanctioning "preventive detention" of unconvicted felons and rolled back the insanity defense by about 140 years of human understanding.

And still pending on the Senate's docket are other "anti-crime" bills that also threaten civil liberties. The worst of these would mangle the exclusionary rule, which prohibits the use of illegally obtained evidence in Federal trials. Though House members face even keener election-year pressures, they must now be looked to for a defense of American justice.

The Senate's bill would permit imprisoning "dangerous" defendants on the basis of nothing more than their inability to "prove" they won't commit a crime if released. That cures no known Federal crime problem. But it turns on its head the sound constitutional principle that defendants should be detained before trial only when there exists a reasonable fear that they will flee. Judges need no new law to deal with bail-jumpers.

In similarly overturning insanity defense, the Senate rashly misjudged the reason a jury may have misapplied it to acquit President Reagan's assailant. The main problem with the insanity defense now is that it requires the prosecution to prove sanity, an extremely difficult burden. But that could be corrected, as the Senate decreed, by requiring the defense to prove insanity.

But instead of stopping there, the Senate also reverted to the 19th-century notion that the only recognizable insanity should be a defendant's inability to distinguish right from wrong. That ignores an entire category of mentally ill people who may know what is right but are wholly incapable of controlling their actions. American law should be above blaming and punishing individuals who are so disabled.

Now the Senate is turning to a separate bill that would allow illegally obtained evidence to be used in Federal criminal trials whenever the judge finds the illegal search or seizure was committed in "good faith." That would obviously relax the pressure on law enforcement agents to observe the law and the Constitution. The bill is probably unconstitutional. Taking it up when the Supreme Court has important cases about the exclusionary rule under advisement is perverse.

This is not the first time the Senate has acted hastily and unwisely on these issues. The House has so far shown a better sense of balance. Even in an election year, it is to be hoped the House will do its duty and stick to measures that really fight crime.●

SOVIET INTENTIONS IN SOUTHERN AFRICA

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

● Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, few Americans realize that the Soviets are actively engaged in a resource war to cut off America's access to the strategic minerals in Namibia and Southern Africa. There is a great deal more to the border war between SWAPO and the Territorial Forces of Namibia and South Africa than meets the eye. The Soviets have apparently selected Namibia, which has the largest uranium mine in the world, plus vast resources of other minerals, as the gateway to ultimate Soviet control of all the critical minerals in Southern Africa upon which U.S. national defense industries depend.

Ever since Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev announced in 1973 that "Our aim is to gain control of the two great treasure houses upon which the West depends—the energy treasure house of the Persian Gulf and the mineral treasure house of Central and Southern Africa", the Soviets have been stepping-up their support for the SWAPO terrorists who are the surrogate forces seeking to take over Namibia from their protected bases in southern Angola.

If the Soviets are successful in gaining control of the critical minerals upon which the United States is now 100 percent import dependent, such as chromium and platinum, our technological capabilities will be seriously restricted. We will be subject to Soviet economic and diplomatic blackmail and will either have to pay exorbitant prices or be denied access to these minerals altogether.

The fact that the Soviets have supplied extremely sophisticated military hardware to SWAPO in recent months, such as 35 to 40 radar systems, a wide range of missile systems including the SA-3, SA-6, SA-8, and now for the first time the heat-seeking ground to air SA-9 missile system, suggests just how serious they are about their desire to control this region of the world. (The SA-9 is a new and quite effective weapon, a 3-foot heat-seeking missile launched from an armored vehicle and capable of striking an aircraft 8,000 yards away.)

The following article from a recent edition of the New York Times should alert us to the grave nature of the Soviet threat in Southern Africa. I suggest that my colleagues take a few moments to carefully review it.

PRETORIA DISPLAYS NEW MISSILE CAPTURED IN ANGOLA

CAPE TOWN, Jan. 28.—The South African Army says that during its latest invasion of Angola it captured a new type of Soviet missile that it asserts has not been seen in the West in its entirety.

The ground-to-air SA-9 system was said to have been seized in a battle that started Jan. 2 in the town of Cuvelai, 125 miles north of the border between South-West Africa and Angola.

"This is the first complete system that has fallen into the hands of the West," Col. Julius Kriel, director of South African Air Force intelligence, said when the missile and its launching system was displayed to reporters here Friday. Colonel Kriel declined to say whether the missile system had also been shown to Western military attaches based in South Africa.

Correspondents were permitted to see the missile provided their reports about it were not published until Sunday morning. This was apparently intended to maximize the disclosure's impact in domestic politics.

The all-white Parliament is to begin its traditional no confidence debate Sunday and the opposition is expected to press the Government on the seriousness of what the authorities call a Soviet military buildup on the border.

Coverage of the missile in the South African press is seemingly intended to reflect this perceived threat. South African commentators suggested today that reports of the Soviet buildup were being promoted so as to justify increased military spending in the new budget next March.

Reporters were shown the missile and its amphibious carrier vehicle in a hanger at an air base. Western military specialists said recently that little was known about the SA-9, a three-foot-long, heat-seeking missile launched from an armored vehicle and capable of striking aircraft 8,000 yards away.

At a briefing before the missile was put on display, a military spokesman said the SA-9 was part of a "very sophisticated and extensive" system of air defenses in southern Angola, all of it Soviet-supplied.

Angola provides bases for insurgents from the South-West Africa People's Organization, which is fighting to overthrow South Africa's control of South-West Africa. South Africa mounts regular invasions of southern Angola, ostensibly to disrupt insurgent campaigns, and has been occupying parts of the former Portuguese territory for two years. The latest invasion began on Dec. 6 and South Africa says its forces have now withdrawn. Angola disputes this.

South African columnists and editorial writers have recently blamed the Government for the reported Soviet buildup in southern Angola, saying the frequent invasions had left the Angolan authorities with little choice but to increase the number of Cuban soldiers there and to seek more advanced arms from Moscow.

The military spokesman said Friday that the insurgents had "moved under the umbrella" of Angolan Army air defenses so as to prevent the South Africans from carrying out aerial reconnaissance.

In a rare public display of South Africa's purported knowledge about military dispositions in southern Angola, the military spokesman said there were at least 35 to 40 radar systems in the area and a wide range of Soviet missiles including SA-3, SA-6, SA-8 and SA-9 weapons. Radar systems included those used to guide SA-3 missiles against hostile aircraft, he said.

Colonel Kriel said Western specialists had previously believed the SA-9 to be a modified version of other missiles. It now seemed, however, that it had been developed "specifically for a role" in low- to medium-level surface-to-air defense, he said.

A rack carrying four of the missiles was mounted on a Soviet-made armored vehicle, which was also displayed. It was pushed into the hanger by a tractor. South African technicians had been unable to start its engine because, Colonel Kriel said, the instructions were written in Russian. Colonel Kriel said it had been abandoned in Cuvelai. It was not clear whether it had been manned by Cubans, Angolans or Soviet troops, he said.●

FmHA ECONOMIC EMERGENCY LOAN PROGRAM

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, the administration of the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) economic emergency loan program and the refusal of the U.S. Department of Agriculture to provide farmers adequate credit assistance have caused substantial economic problems for our Nation's farmers.

I am today introducing a resolution expressing the sense of the House that the FmHA should obligate not less than $500 million of the economic emergency loan funds to the insured loan component of the program. Senator DALE BUMPERS introduced a similar resolution in the Senate.

Secretary Block's decision in November, 1982, to freeze the $600 million in funding was disturbingly insensitive to the economic plight of farmers experiencing financial difficulties. That decision defied the intent of Congress and ignored the needs of this country's farmers. It is extremely disturbing that farmers had to take legal action in Federal court against their own Government to obtain financial assistance which had been authorized by Congress.

In ordering Secretary Block to release the economic emergency funds, U.S. District Court Judge Flannery concluded that "throughout the year (1982) the Secretary received reports of growing numbers of delinquent loans and foreclosures." The court found Secretary Block's decision to be an abuse of his discretionary authority in view of the mounting evidence of farmers' financial distress. That situation has not changed. The number of FmHA farm foreclosures increased from 844 in fiscal 1982 to 1,347 in fiscal 1983. There have already been 250 FmHA foreclosures this fiscal year. The delinquency rate was 16 percent higher on September 30, 1983, than it was at that same time the year before.

When the Secretary was ordered to release the funds, I thought that there was some relief in sight for farmers. Unfortunately, those thoughts proved to be short lived. In its apportionment of the $600 million, the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) has prevented the funds from being distributed in a manner which would offer the most affordable emergency assistance to farmers. In a complete reversal of past policy, OMB has allocated only $50 million, less than 10 percent, of the funds to be loaned directly by the FmHA as insured loans. Furthermore, that $50 million had been exhausted by the time that OMB issued the apportionment order.

I wrote OMB on January 23, to protest the apportionment of the $600 million. During the first 4 operating years of the economic emergency loan program, approximately 95 percent of the funds were distributed as direct, insured loans, for a total of nearly $6.3 billion. More than 67,000 farmers participated in the program. Approximately 63,650 of those farmers received insured loans from the FmHA.

In ordering the Secretary to release the funds, Judge Flannery stated that:

> There is no reason to believe that a proportionately large number would not have participated had the program been implemented by the Secretary . . .

Accordingly, a proportionately large number of farmers would now be receiving insured loans had the funds been apportioned as they had been during the first three operating years.

If the remaining $550 million is allocated as guaranteed loans, we can expect participation in the program to decline substantially. Farmers will simply not be able to pay the higher interest rates charged by commercial lending institutions. For example, the FmHA usually charges approximately 10.25 percent for a real estate loan, whereas commercial lending institutions are currently charging about 13.5 percent. The difference comes to approximately $222 per month on a loan of $100,000 over 20 years. That amount of money is a considerable sum for a financially hard pressed farmer. Moreover, the rate difference is even higher for operating loans.

The purpose of the economic emergency loan program is that of providing emergency assistance to farmers in the most affordable way possible. The most affordable method is a direct, insured loan; not a guaranteed loan. In establishing the program, Congress recognized the inability of many farmers to obtain credit from sources other than the FmHA because of abnormally depressed economic conditions in their respective areas. By allocating $550 million as guaranteed loans through commercial lending institutions, OMB has undermined the usefulness of the program.

OMB's apportionment of the $600 million is just as capricious as Secretary Block's decision to freeze the funds. The administration's failure to respond effectively to the plight of financially squeezed farmers and administer the program as Congress had intended is deplorable. Just as there was no legitimate justification to freeze the funds in the first place, there is no reasonable justification to allocate only $50 million as insured loans.

In my home State of Minnesota, 150 farmers applied for insured loans after the funds became available on December 22. However, only one farmer was able to receive an insured loan before the $50 million allocation was exhausted on January 13. Minnesota would have received approximately $24 million if the funds had been allocated as they were in the past. While that amount would not have alleviated completely the depressed financial condition of the farmers in my State, it would have been a significant help. There is not enough credit in rural Minnesota to serve farmers' needs.

The administration made clear its position on the economic emergency loan program by refusing to propose a reauthorization of the program in its fiscal 1984 and 1985 budget requests. While Congress has refused to go along with many of the administration's unfair proposals, we continue to face unnecessary obstacles imposed by the administration. The OMB is hardly the agency to entrust with the distribution of funding for assistance programs.

The House Agriculture Committee Subcommittee on Conservation, Credit and Rural Development commendably has begun a full-scale oversight review of the misallocation of the loan program. On February 2, the gentleman from Tennessee, who chairs the subcommittee, convened a hearing of his subcommittee at which I testified. The subcommittee intends to pursue the issue, and I very much hope that it will act favorably and soon on my resolution.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring my resolution calling for the reallocation of economic emergency loans program consistent with the intent of Congress and previous practice. It is critical that we act to help those farmers who face financial hardships and are unable to receive credit from other sources.●

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 1, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues today to commemorate the founding of the independent state of Ukraine. The Ukrainian people enjoyed the blessings of independence for only a short time, but they displayed strength and fortitude in their heroic struggle. The beginning of this nation was turbulent and bloody. Three continuous years of war raged with Red and White Russian troops to the east and Polish troops in the west. At the end, the Ukrainian nation lay crushed by the numerically superior Red army.

A systematic effort to obliterate any nationalistic feeling in the Ukraine followed this independence movement, culminating in 1933 with the tragic, manmade famine. Still, these extreme measures did not destroy the hopes of the brave people living in the Ukraine, as they demonstrated again in 1968 with their wholehearted support of the reformations taking place across the border in Czechloslovakia, and today with the formation, despite heavy persecutions, of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords.

As with many of the people in the Soviet orbit, the Ukrainians are reluctant to wear the chain of Soviet hegemony unquestionably. The hope for freedom remains strong in the Ukraine, as it does in Poland, Hungary, and in many other lands. We salute today not only a noble, brief period in the history of the Ukrainian people, but the unfaltering spirit of national identity, as alive today as it was in 1918.

It is with admiration that we commemorate this courage, perserverance and spirit of the Ukrainian people.●

TRIBUTE TO TOM MATHERLEE

HON. JAMES T. BROYHILL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, last week Mr. Tom Matherlee was sworn in as chairman of the American Hospital Association board of trustees. Tom is the president of Gaston Memorial Hospital in Gastonia, N.C. He is not only one of my constituents; he is also a very good friend of mine.

Tom began his career in health care as an attendant in a small hospital in Ohio, and his climb up the ladder in the field of hospital administration has been steady and sure. He is a past president of the North Carolina Hospital Association, and has served in a number of posts with the American Hospital Association through the years.

Given the amount of health legislation before the Congress, and the attention which is being focused on spiraling health-care costs, I want to share with you Tom Matherlee's investiture speech before the American Hospital Association. I know that you will find his remarks to be relevant and thought provoking, as he discusses the challenges facing the Congress and all those interested in insuring quality, affordable health care for all Americans.

INVESTITURE SPEECH OF TOM MATHERLEE, CHAIRMAN, AMERICAN HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Without having any idea he was doing it, a 17th century English minister named John Tillotson clearly described why we have many of the challenges we face in the hospital and health care industry today. He said nothing about health care or cost, demand or productivity, governmental budget cuts or government programs, insurance, biomedical ethics, capital needs or technology. In fact, he wrote only one line that the editors of Bartlett's quotations consider worthy of immortality in their book. That one line could have been written for us.

"Those in the highest places," Tillotson observed, "Have the least liberty—because they are the most observed!"

How simple that is, and how true: Those in the highest places have the least liberty—because they are the most observed!

People have a double standard for behavior between themselves and other ordinary mortals—and those who have been elevated to high position.

People might cheat a little on a company expense account and know their neighbor takes a cash payment instead of a check for a service to hide the income. But they are horrified and demand stern punishment for a judge or business executive who is found taking a bribe or otherwise breaking the law.

What is true of individuals is also true of institutions, especially now, in this era of consumerism.

Big industries, leaders in their field, become big by meeting needs for more and bigger and better products. As well as jobs and wages and fringe benefits. Once they become leaders, however, they are expected to solve problems that affect them—and that they affect. Many of the demands made on them might be unjust, or impossible, but they are made just the same.

I'm sure you can see clearly how the concept applies to us. Both in the demand for solutions and the willingness to punish failure.

There are many problems in the health care field. To whom is the nation looking to solve those problems? The answer is another question: who has risen to the highest, and consequently, the most observed position in health care? I think the answer is hospitals and physicians. We are elected—we the hopsitals and physicians. We who have risen to the highest position in health care, and are the most observed.

In the next few minutes I want to review with you a few of the issues that have brought us to our mountain top location and reflect a little bit on what we as an association can do to address those highly visible issues and uphold our responsbility as highly visible leaders. I will touch on costs, capital, caring, Congress, and commitment.

COSTS

Listen to what some leaders say about health care: "They are eliminating the nonessential, or, as the public expresses it, cutting out the frills." And these words of wisdom . . ." It is not only the public which needs education on hospital costs and curtailment; our doctors may need it twice as much." Or this story I read: "Privately owned hospitals have suffered because the community has dumped upon them the indigent and accident load that should have been borne by taxation." These are not words from recent publications. They are, in fact, quotations from presidential addresses to the American Hospital Association in the years 1933 and 1935, 50 years ago.

In preparation for my comments today, I reviewed many such speeches of the past made to this organization.

I conclude that cost of health care has always been a concern and it will continue to be. Costs are always considered too high. Although a healthy body is something every person wants, it takes dollars that they would rather spend on someting else. Paying for health care services creates a conflict of desires. Today is no different than 50 years ago except there are different actors on the scene.

So, in the working life of those in this room, we have arrived, at one of those crucial points in the evolution of the hospital industry.

The pendulum is swinging from programs and policies directed to accessibility, improved technology and provision of more services. The pendulum is swinging toward less dependence on the acute care hospital, less support for technology, less growth in the dollars available for health care services. And, if we are not vigilant, the pendulum will swing away from the "care" in health care. The pendulum is powered, not by health policy but, rather, by budget policy.

Why is this pendulum swinging away from the good things we have all worked for? We have become a large industry, a visible industry, and industry whose problems of today and tomorrow have been created by our successfully meeting the challenges of yesterday.

Our industry has been a growth industry, spurred on by government and business programs touting access to health care services and quality in delivery. Today, the Medicare and Medicaid programs provide some coverage for 51 million elderly, disabled or needy people. Another 140-150 million are covered by employers or union-sponsored health insurance. Approximately 90 percent of our bills are paid by third parties.

Attention to growth, the demands for access, and our success in meeting these demands has created a false impression that hospitals have unlimited resources and capabilities and that we have no vulnerability.

Now sentiment has turned against continued rapid growth in expenditures. We are at a critical point because we are going to have to learn to manage with less at a time when our elderly population is increasing dramatically.

We cannot . . . indeed must not . . . stop caring and we cannot withhold our services from those who need care. We are at a critical point in our industry because our purchasers are trying to judge the efficacy, effectiveness, and cost benefit of our services, frequently without a real understanding of what the numbers and data mean. And we do not have adequate data to demonstrate a positive relationship between dollars spent and health status achieved.

We are at a critical point because we are faced with purchasers and competitors who want to shrink our historical base of operation, which is acute inpatient care. We are at a critical point because Medicare prospective pricing—the most significant change in payment systems our hospitals have ever faced—is being implemented in two-thirds of our hospitals at this time.

During this year we will see the results of the first complete year under the Medicare prospective payment system for these hospitals and we will see those not yet covered brought under the umbrella.

It will be a year of contrasts and a year of squeeze. In a few months it will be time for "show and tell"! Our job is to put forth our best efforts to see that the prospective payment system works. The alternative is a heavy-handed regulatory approach, and we must avoid it.

CAPITAL

Another highly visible and pivotal cost issue involves capital dollars. My belief is founded on projections of need, the large federal deficits, the pendulum swing of world-wide investment, changes in health care payment systems, the ever present threat in our state capitols and the Congress to restrict our capital sources, and the inability of a large segment of our industry to qualify in the capital market.

What is the need? It's large—maybe 100 to 200 billion dollars in the 1980's for replacement and renovation. Maybe as much as 85 percent of our hospital plant capacity will reach the end of its useful life during this decade. To put this need in perspective, consider that from 1973-1979, a period of much growth, only approximately 25 billion dollars was spent on hospital construction.[1]

Huge federal deficits also forewarn of difficulties in the capital markets. Many knowledgeable people believe that these deficits will squeeze out private borrowers. Given unsustainable federal budget deficits and the fickleness of currency values in a world-wide economy, a dollar crunch is almost certain to occur and federal borrowing needs will create even greater pressure on the private sector's ability to access capital markets.

The sources of capital in the hospital industry have changed dramatically over the past 10-15 years. In the late 1960's, debt represented a little over one-third of capital financing. Today debt is well in excess of two-thirds. Debt has emerged as the single most important source of non-federal hospital construction funding, with tax exempt bonds representing the largest share of this resource. Even with this shift, however, only 1100 hospitals (according to a recent study by an investment banking firm) have ever issued hospital revenue bonds.[2]

[2] "Tax-Exempt Hospital Revenue Bonds—Health Care Trends and Criteria For Bond Analysis." John Nuveen & Co., Inc., Chicago. Reported in Modern Health Care, October 1983, p. 174.

The report indicates that a major reason is that many hospitals have difficulty getting investment-grade credit ratings because major rating agencies rarely rate hospitals with less than 100 beds and about one-third of not-for-profit hospitals fall into that category.

At the federal level and in many states, some want to limit our access to debt financing, through the tax-exempt and taxable markets. Numerous states are looking at "caps" or "ceilings" on capital expenditures and we have and will continue to face challenges at the federal level to tax-exempt revenue bonds.

The changes taking place in the payment systems for health care services are another critical element. We need an adequate operating margin for capital formation. Moderating against that are inadequate Medicaid payments, demands from large third-party payers for discounts and elimination or reduction of public funding.

Will hospitals with current debt be able to generate funds to repay that debt and provide for future capital needs? How should we address the capital payment factor under the prospective payment systems in order to assure that all hospitals receive fair and equitable treatment under the system?

The factors surrounding the capital issue are, indeed, complex. They are not subject to simplistic solutions and business as usual proposals. It is imperative that we maintain our access to tax-exempt revenue sources, but it is also imperative that we not be so dependent on this one source. It is a fragile source, subject to political winds and the mind set of regulators. We must develop strategies for capital sources which will provide several options, one of which is how to reduce capital need.

Just as our industry moved to address a problem with availability when malpractice insurance sources dwindled a few years ago, so may there be an opportunity today and tomorrow for this great Association and the State associations represented on this stage to be creative in addressing the capital formation and access issue.

CARING

Costs and capital are not the only highly visible issues that confront us. Another of the difficulties we face in our industry is a growing skepticism about our motivation. Although many people are supportive of their local hospital, they question the motives of the industry as a whole. On occasion, one poor example gets magnified to the point that people believe it is our standard. We hear about the one patient who is difficult to place rather than the thousands who get care everyday without regard to financial resources. An insurance industry organization tells the public that hospitals are totally uncontrolled on costs and touts. "Fair Payment Systems" as the answer, a fancy name for an uproven all-payers regulatory system.

To negate such improper interpretations of our industry we must show our caring attitude. Care about those we serve as individuals, as human beings! Care about the economic situation in our communities! Care about those who need help but can't afford it! Care about the efficiency and effectiveness of our organizations! Care about the impact of our decisions in human and financial terms!

We talk a lot about quality, and we should! But we must really concern ourselves with caring. Patients do not always understand the quality aspects of our technological business—but they do know whether we care!

In our fervor of striving for new ways to do things, in our corporate reorganizations, and in our home offices which are sometimes remote and which can tend to remove our minds from our purpose of being, we must not forget why we are in business. We must occasionally feel the pain of our acute care endeavors—the pain of a tormented young man or young lady travelling the road far from home searching for drugs to ease their torment—the pain of the child with cancer—the pain of the elderly who are broken in body and spirit—the burn victim—the accident victim—the attacked! We must visualize the beauty of the healthy newborn child and the agony of the deformed! We must not forget and we must not let those in the halls of Congress forget!

If we can assure those whom we serve that we care—if we can demonstrate to those who make our laws that we care—then, perhaps, some of those who would attack us might be persuaded to become our healers in our time of need! We must keep the "care" in health care!

CONGRESS

Hospitals are caring institutions. They also must be politically active institutions, in a politically strong industry. In a national association like the American Hospital Association, people band together to share and learn from each other about common interests, and to achieve common purposes together that they cannot achieve separately.

The fact that they associate does not mean that all of a sudden the people lose all their identity, that there are no differences. For those who are sincere in their desire to make the association meaningful is means a willingness to work to minimize the differences and maximize the common purpose when it counts the most. So it is and always has been with the American Hospital Association.

There are skeptics who proclaim that the American Hospital Association can no longer represent all hospitals because hospitals are too diverse. People who see only the differences in hospitals fail to see the central purpose in all hospitals, the common thread that makes us what we are called—hospital—a place that cares for peoples' health needs.

In AHA, too, our diversity is recognized but our central core is also still there. To achieve harmony does not mean there can be no differences. In fact, to achieve harmony there must be differences. Harmony is created by different notes—as long as the notes are in the same key. As long as we know the key—our purpose for being—we can be diverse but still be an association for all hospitals.

Lifeless things, forms, do not change themselves—they are changed by other factors and forces; things with life change themselves as a natural process as they grow. This association has exhibited its life, has changed as a natural process through the years because its members have changed. The recommendations of the "Future Directions" Committee are being implemented this year.

The changing face of our Association calls for more involvement of those who have long served this Association well, the managers of our nation's hospitals. Managers of hospitals of all types participating through our new constituency sections, in addition to our traditional mode of representation in the House of Delegates will, in my opinion, greatly enhance the quality of our deliberations. The changes also call for greater involvement of hospital trustees and members of hospital medical staffs in our policy development process.

To achieve success in dealing with the issues confronting our hospitals today we must maintain a strong membership base. I believe we are strong and can become stronger as we implement the "Future Directions" recommendations. When you consider the potential of 6,000 institutional members with their boards of trustees, medical staffs, employees, auxiliaries, and their families we can be a potent force. When you consider 37,000 personal members, we can be a potent force. We simply must channel the energy.

To achieve success we must maintain a strong, skilled voice in Washington and our state capitals, as at no other time. Our voice needs to be heard more than ever. We must have staffs that are ever watchful and networks which can spring into action on short notice. Look how swiftly the Medicare Prospective Payment System moved through the Congress.

This Association has cooperated with the federal government in the development of the Medicare Prospective Payment System in order to try to reduce the rate of growth in health care costs. The system is not yet in place in all of our hospitals and there are already those who are desirous of changing it with their "quick fix" solution. Some suggest limiting the market basket inflation factor or taking away the 1% technology factor. There are those who are heralding an "all-payers" system without understanding what such a system means. These threats must not go unchallenged.

We will continue to work for reduction in the rate of increase in health care costs through encouragement of improved productivity, greater efficiency in our operations and innovations in delivery of services. We must at the same time, however, make it abundantly clear to the federal and state governments that we have a commitment to our fellow man, and that the commitment takes dollars. When cuts inhibit the commitment, we must be willing to stand up and be counted. Such commitment is necessary for success.

Because there is no health policy, I believe we must raise the consciousness level of Congress for the need of one. I do not mean a pie in the sky document, but some clear statements on which services are to be provided and at what level.

If a policy were in existence, I am convinced we could meet its demands. We have done so in the past when access and improvements in technology were the bywords. We have to know what the policy is, however, and the resources have to be there to support the policy.

To achieve success in the political arena, I believe, takes active participation of all our association members in deed and in dollars. No amount of dollars contributed through our PAC is going to buy us any votes, but it will help us to gain the ear of the legislators so that we can tell our story.

There are many issues facing us in Washington even though it is an election year. Budget neutrality on health care funds, tinkering with the prospective payment system, debates over the solvency of the Medicare trust fund, capital, planning, peer review, all-payers system, cap proposal, further cuts in funds, legislation on the handicapped, tax bills, Medicaid, plus many more. During 1984, we must prepare ourselves for action after the rhetoric has faded and the election is over.

Another important activity which will begin this year and through which we can help ourselves is the campaign "Telling the Hospital Story." Our detractors would have the world believe that we are uncaring about people, resources used, or being effective and efficient in our operations. To tell the hospital story cannot be done by our national organization alone. Through the joint efforts of this Association, the state associations, the regional associations, and individual hospitals, however, I believe we can begin to show those whom we serve that we do indeed care about them, that we care about costs, that we are working to make our enterprises more efficient and effective, and that they have a friend in their hospital.

One could easily despair if they dwelt only on the problems and challenges our industry faces at this point in our history. I believe, however, that we should dwell on what we can do to help ourselves.

I am reminded of a story that I heard in a church service several years ago. It is simply titled, "Grandpa's Gate." The story relates that an elderly gentleman was repairing the gate to his garden fence. His young grandson approached and said, "Watcha doin', Grandpa?" The grandfather replied, "I'm fixin' this gate, Son," The grandson responded. "Why are you fixin' the gate, Grandpa?" And, as he continued to work, the grandfather replied, "Because the gate is broken. And, you see, Son, some things repair themselves; some things others have to repair; some things can't be repaired at all; some things only God can repair; and, son, some things I have to repair!"

Ladies and gentlemen, our challenge is to find those things which we need to repair! I am confident that we have the intellectual capacity, the organizational skills, and the people to do the job that needs to be done in the health care services arena if we really set our minds to it. It is incumbent that we, as an association of people and organizations, who know more about delivering health care services than anybody else in this great land of ours, take the initiative. Like Grandpa's gate, this is one of those things we can repair ourselves.

Ours is a human endeavor, involving human beings and human lives. The success of this Association is dependent upon the level of our commitment to our human purpose, to our commitment to those things we believe in. Are you committed, really committed, or are you simply involved? There is a difference, you know. In the typical breakfast of ham and eggs, the chicken is involved—the pig is committed! Are you willing to forego individual expediency for the long term good of all our members and those we serve?

What would we do without the American Hospital Association? Why are we here? We are here because of a voluntary decision, a belief that we can accomplish together what we cannot accomplish apart. We can pull together and make it together or we can get into turf wars and sink each other. We must be bigger than our differences and smaller than our pride!

I am excited about this Association and the opportunities the uncertainties of the future present us with. I am committed to this Association—committed to doing what I can to further its purposes and having a positive impact on health care services delivery. I pledge myself to represent you the best I know how, to listen to your concerns, to act where indicated and within my power. You have honored me by electing me to be your Chairman. I shall work tenaciously to uphold that honor and trust. I cannot function in isolation however. It will take the efforts of all these talented people behind me on this stage, the efforts of all in this audience, and the efforts of all our members back home to make this a successful year. With your help and by being indivisible we can succeed!●

FOUR MILLION MEMBERS OF THE AFL-CIO BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT OPPOSE H.R. 555

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the House is scheduled to resume consideration of H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act.

H.R. 555 would repeal a carefully crafted Federal Energy Regulatory Commission ruling which the Commissioners unanimously believed fulfilled their regulatory responsibility "both to protect ratepayers from high rates, while at the same time insuring that utilities will continue to provide economic and reliable utility service, now and in the future."

The Commissioners at FERC studied this issue for almost 2 years. They received testimony from over 200 witnesses representing every side of this question. They concluded that failure to allow a utility to recover on a current basis at least a portion of the financing charges on new construction would result in "rate shock" (drastic, sudden rate hikes) to electricity consumers immediately upon completion of a new generating plant.

I believe that the ratepayer should be protected from such rate shock. Proponents of H.R. 555 claim this bill is "proconsumer". I do not see how any bill which would inflict on the consumer "rate shocks" as high as 30 percent could be classified as "proconsumer". If anything, H.R. 555 is "anticonsumer".

The 4 million members of the Building and Construction Trades Department of the AFL-CIO obviously agree with me.

I am enclosing in the RECORD at this point, a mailgram which was sent to all Members of the House of Representatives today opposing H.R. 555.

MAILGRAM

Date: February 7, 1984.

To: Members of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Sometime this week, you will be voting on H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act.

While proponents of this legislation claim this bill is "proconsumer", consumers will ultimately pay the capitalization costs when the project is put on line. H.R. 555 merely defers the rate increase from the time construction starts, to the time the plant begins to generate electricity * * * Then the consumer gets hit with an enormous rate increase.

The four million members of the Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL-CIO, do not support H.R. 555, and urge you to do the same.

ROBERT A. GEORGINE,
President, Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL-CIO.●

A TRIBUTE TO CANTOR NATHAN AND GRACE KATZMAN

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Cantor Nathan and Grace Katzman, two very special people who have devoted 37 years of service to Hollywood Temple Beth El in Los Angeles and who are lifelong friends of mine and of my family.

The Katzmans, who will be honored at the 62d Anniversary Ball on March 4, 1984, have played a very special role in my own life, as well as the lives of countless others in the Los Angeles community. It is with great pride that I share their accomplishments with my colleagues.

Cantor Katzman began his singing career at the age of 8 in Nicolaiev, Russia, where he sang in his father's choir. As a young man he dreamed of an operatic career and studied at the Juilliard School of Music in New York. He later traveled to Brussels to study opera, but the desire to express his religious feelings cantorally, as had his father and grandfather before him, became too strong. Cantor Katzman soon returned to the United States where he was selected to succeed Cantor Reichman at the B'nai Zion Congregation in Chicago.

On one of his frequent visits to Detroit to visit his father, the renowned David Katzman, Nathan was introducted to Grace Klein. They were wed on February 18, 1940, and on November 7, 1943, the Katzmans were blessed with a son, Joel.

The Katzmans spent 7 years with B'nai Zion and then moved to Los Angeles. Early in 1947, Mark Katzman joined the Katzman family, on January 13. Also in 1947, when Nathan Katzman was performing at a benefit concert, he was heard by some of the lay leaders of Hollywood's Temple Beth El. They invited him to audition before a select committee of the Temple and he has remained there ever since. No practitioner of politics could fail to be impressed by Cantor Katzman's staying power, outlasting more rabbinical colleagues during this time than most people can count.

In addition to his duties as Beth El's Cantor, Nathan has served as school principal, Hebrew teacher, Bar and Bat Mitzvah tutor, and music and drama director. I was privileged to study with Cantor Katzman for my own Bar Mitzvah in 1956—and I think it is appropriate to mention here that no Sabbath or holiday service has ever seemed truly glowing to me unless it included Cantor Katzman.

Grace Katzman, a devoted wife, mother, and grandmother is also a talented artist. She has added beauty and artistry to numerous gatherings at Beth El, including the beautiful mural which hangs above the stage in the Emma Levine Garden Room, a room that holds a special place in my heart as it is dedicated to my own grandmother. Grace is also active in the sisterhood, where she has held numerous positions.

The Katzmans contributions to the community extend far beyond the boundaries of the synagogue. They have given their time and talent to countless causes and organizations including the University of Judaism, Hebrew University, Jewish Institute for the Blind, Survivors of Concentration Camps, National Women's League, B'nai B'rith, Hadassah, Mount Sinai Hospital, Gateways Hospital, United Synagogue of America, Camp Ramah, Yiddish Culture Club, Histadrut, Los Angeles Home for the Aged, the Senior Citizens Association of Los Angeles, and many more.

Most recently, Cantor Katzman was selected to participate in the Fourth International Congress on Humor, which will take place this summer in Tel Aviv, Israel. His presentation will deal with the humor reflected in Yiddish folk music.

The list of accomplishments for these two is endless. They have touched the lives of so many individuals and it is a personal joy to call them my friends.●

THE CHILD ABUSE AMENDMENTS

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, on February 2, 1984, the House of Representatives voted on H.R. 1904, the Child Abuse Amendments of 1983. This legislation reauthorized the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act. I would like to clarify my position on sections of this bill which address the ethics of treatment of handicapped infants.

In 1982 in Bloomington, Ind., an infant was born with Down's syndrome and respiratory and digestive complications. The child's parents, with the support of their doctors and the courts, withheld food and treatment from the child. Since the infant's death, many people and groups have tried to determine whether decisions to withhold treatment violate any laws, and who should make this kind of decision.

Medical groups, disability representatives, and Government officials discussed this dilemma. After considerable consultation and cooperation, these groups approved the Department of Health and Human Services' [HHS] final rule, which set up voluntary hospital review panels to oversee decisions involving the care of handicapped infants. This rule is based on civil rights law which prohibits discrimination on the basis of handicap. The Washington Post of February 3, 1984, reports that an HHS spokesman said, "We feel our regulations are satisfactory. We don't feel additional legislation is necessary."

The child abuse amendments of 1983, however, contained provisions requiring States to insure that severely handicapped infants receive nutrition, medically indicated treatment, general care, and appropriate social services. If States do not meet this requirement, they will lose funding for child abuse treatment and prevention. Furthermore, any decision by parents, doctors, and clergy to withhold treatment must be reported as child abuse. The amendments put a difficult, agonizing decision to withhold treatment made by parents, doctors, and clergy in the same category as beating or molesting a child.

The child abuse amendments put the Government in the role of decisionmaker, as the provider of one answer which applies to all situations. Yet there are varying degrees of handicaps. At one extreme is an infant born 6 months early with several life-threatening handicaps, who will suffer a painful life and death, dying within a month, leaving his parents with tremendous grief and guilt, and medical bills over $50,000. At another extreme is an infant born deaf, a disability which many successfully overcome.

The parents who face each situation must live with the results of their decisions. Withholding treatment is extremely difficult; withholding treatment from an infant whose arrival was anticipated with joy is tragic. If the decision must be made, I believe it should be made by those who have the best interests of the child at heart: Parents, doctors, and clergy. The hospital review panel will oversee the decisionmaking process and lend support when needed.

An amendment was offered by Representative WAXMAN to the child abuse amendments to provide a more reasonable approach to this situation. The amendment, which I voted for, would have required the Department of Health and Human Services to issue guidelines for hospitals that want to establish ethical advisory committees to offer advice on the treatment of severely handicapped infants, and to help establish hospital treatment policies. The amendment would have established a national commission to study the issue of treatment of handicapped infants. Finally, it would have required HHS to compile a directory of physicians with expertise in the care and treatment of handicapped infants. Unfortunately, the amendment was defeated, 182 to 231. I also voted for Representative MILLER'S amendment to provide assistance to the victims of family violence. This amendment passed, 367 to 31.

Even though I disagreed with the provisions relating to handicapped infants, I had planned to vote for final passage of the Child Abuse Amendments of 1983 because I firmly support Federal funding of child abuse prevention and treatment. The legislation passed the House by a vote of 396 to 4. To my deep regret, I was unable to leave my office during the final vote. I was in an interview with the Independent Network News about ethylene dibromide [EDB], the chemical which the Environmental Protection Agency banned on February 3. As a member of the House Agriculture Committee, I believe that my first responsibility was to try to educate the public about EPA's decision.

I congratulate the Members who worked on the child abuse legislation for their efforts to address difficult, complex, and tragic situations. I hope this legislation and other Federal activities will help prevent and treat child abuse.

With increasing technical medical advancements, and the resulting increasing demands on medical and social resources, we are venturing into an area of tough choices. We must be very careful about how these choices are made, and about who makes them. Thomas Jefferson said:

> I know of no safe depository of the ultimate powers of the society but the people themselves.

I think vesting in Government the power to override decisions made on an individual basis by doctors, clergy, and families is an unwarranted, ill-advised depository. I fear that our good intentions and high ideals will never take the place of the love and grief which parents with an infant with life-threatening handicaps must bear.●

HARD WORK PAYS DIVIDENDS TO DR. KWANG-MING CHEN

HON. ANTONIO BORJA WON PAT

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of my colleagues to a hard working scientist who may have found the origins of a terrible neurological disease which plagued the people of Guam for many years.

The gentleman in question, Dr. Kwang-Ming Chen, is a neurologist with the Guam Research Center, and after 30 years of intensive study into the causes of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis—Lou Gehrig's disease—and Parkinsonism-dementia/PD, Dr. Chen believes that one source of the illnesses on Guam may be the high concentration of aluminum found naturally in Guam's water supplies.

His findings are of great importance to my people since the incidence of such diseases are estimated to be much higher per capita on the island than elsewhere in the world.

It is hoped that through the hard work of Dr. Chen, others can find a cure to these horrible illnesses and rid my people of these threats to life and good health.

Recently, the 17th Guam Legislature adopted a resolution honoring Dr. Chen for his brilliant work. At this time I will insert the resolution in the RECORD as a reflection of the high esteem in which we hold this great man and as a lesson to others that hard work does bring about its own rewards. Thank you.

RESOLUTION No. 374

Be it resolved by the legislature of the Territory of Guam:

Whereas, Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis/ALS or Lou Gehrig's disease, locally known as Lytico, and Parkinsonism-Dementia/PD, locally known as Bodig, are terminal illness that have a high incidence on Guam; and

Whereas, Lytico and Bodig have been diagnosed among Chamorros on Guam since the early 20th century, but it wasn't until 1953-54 that it was discovered that Chamorros on Guam had ALS 100 times more often than elsewhere in the world; and

Whereas, Dr. Kwang-Ming Chen, a neurologist with the Guam Research Center, has spent thirty years in the study of these diseases; and

Whereas, in 1964, Drs. Chen and Yoshiro Yase, began to suspect an environmental cause of the disease, with Guam's water being a leading suspect as well as the high concentration of aluminum found naturally in the water and soil; and

Whereas, after considerable study, Drs. Chen and Yase ruled out hereditary factors unless they occur at a molecular level, turning their attention to an interaction between high aluminum and low calcium and magnesium levels in the water supplies; and

Whereas, Dr. Chen, has concluded in an unpublished medical paper that "trace metal analyses of ecological environment and central nervous system definitely implicate interaction between aluminum, calcium and other trace elements playing a key role in the pathogenesis of Guam type ALS (Lytico) and PD(Bodig)"; and

Whereas, through Dr. Chen's study, it appears that the etiology of this most elusive disease of the central nervous system may have been found, and its prevention or treatment may be on the horizon; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, that the Seventeenth Guam Legislature, on behalf of the people of Guam, commend Dr. Kwang-Ming Chen on his latest findings on Lytico and Bodig; and be it futher

Resolved, that the Seventeenth Guam Legislature recommend that Dr. Kwang-Ming Chen be nominated for induction into the "Guma Onra" for his outstanding contribution in the field of Medicine and Health; and be it further

Resolved, that the Speaker certify to and the Legislative Secretary attest the adoption hereof and that copies be thereafter transmitted to Dr. Kwang-Ming Chen; to Dr. Yoshiro Yase; to the Chinese Association of Guam; to the Japanese Consulate; to the Guam Lytico and Bodig Association; to the Muscular Dystrophy Association; to the Mayo Foundation; to the Parkinson's Disease Foundation; to the Parkinson's Educational Program; to the National Multiple Sclerosis Society; to the Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis Society of America; to Margaret Heckler, Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services; to Congressman Antonio B. Won Pat; to Senator Lowell Weicker, Chairperson of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services and Education; and to the Governor of Guam.●

PASS HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 192

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, today the House of Representatives will be considering Senate Concurrent Resolution 80 which expresses the sense of Congress that the President should take all steps necessary to bring the question of self-determination of the Baltic States before the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation and reaffirm our Nation's longstanding commitment to furthering the basic human rights of the Baltic peoples as guaranteed to them in the Helsinki accords and various other multilateral agreements.

The history of the Baltic States during this century has been recounted many times in this Chamber. Unfortunately, theirs is another example of not only the brutality, but the reality of Soviet communism.

Today, the Baltic States suffer under the cruelty of Soviet totalitarianism. Their basic rights as human beings, rights that we take for granted, do not exist. Their own culture, language, and religion has been brutally suppressed through intense Russification. While the world community is generally aware of the illegal incorporation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union, this issue of self-determination for the peoples of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania has never been fully discussed before in a world forum.

As cochairmen of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Baltic States and Ukraine, Congressman BRIAN DONNELLY and myself sponsored legislation, House Concurrent Resolution 192, calling on the President to direct the U.S. delegation to the United Nations to discuss the issue of the self-determination for the Baltic States before all appropriate U.N. forums. This specifically includes the next session for the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva which will convene on February 6, 1984. This is why we have urged this resolution be brought to the floor post haste.

House Concurrent Resolution 192 reflects the fact that the United States has never recognized the unlawful annexation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union, and also reaffirms our Nation's commitment to human rights and self-determination for all peoples. The legislation, therefore focuses on presenting the Baltic case to the U.N. Human Rights Commission under agenda item 9, entitled "The Rights of Peoples to Self-Determination and Its Application to Peoples Under Colonial or Alien Domination." Under this particular agenda point, the Commission can take action on the self-determination questions, as it did regarding Afghanistan 2 years ago.

Although the Baltic States border on Russia proper, they have always been Western oriented. For the United States to remain passive on the issues of human rights and self-determination for the countries of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania is to ignore the traditional ties of the Baltic nations to the West, to renege on all the basic principles of its Constitution, and to render meaningless its statements regarding support for the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other relevant documents.

As sponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 192, I ask that my colleagues support me and call on the U.S. delegation to the United Nations Human Rights Commission to state the case of self-determination for the Baltic peoples and illuminate the disrespect for human rights consistently demonstrated by the Soviet Union.

It is important that we in the United States who enjoy fundamental freedoms, continue to speak out against the illegal occupation of the Baltic countries by the Soviet Union and for the restoration of the freedoms they have been denied for so long.●

NATIONAL ENGINEERS' WEEK

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, by Presidential message the week of February 17-25 is National Engineers' Week and I rise to recognize the many great contributions of the men and women of this profession. I also want to recognize Dr. Joseph Bordogna of the Moore School of Electrical Engineering at the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Bordogna has been named the 1984 Engineer of the Year, an outstanding achievement.

Mr. Speaker, the celebration of National Engineers' Week is both a time to reflect on the great achievements of this profession as well as to plan for the possibilities and the greatness of our future.

Engineering has played an increasingly important role in our daily lives. With the highest standards of competency and integrity, engineers have made human life not only longer but also richer and better. Long gone are the days when engineers were thought of only as men who wear striped hats and drive locomotives. Today, the practice of engineering extends into virtually all facets of life: Communications, transportation, agriculture, architecture, industrial production, and biomedicine, to name just a few of the fields in which engineering has exercised spectacular influence and met with unprecedented success. Undoubtedly, engineers have a special talent for solving problems of practical interest and everyday needs.

With energetic pursuit, engineers have made astounding technological developments. In our modern era, what is most remarkable is the engineer's possession of what seems to be an innate ability to think small—equipment that in decades past would take 10 men to carry has now been modified and perfected to the extent that it now fits into the palm of your hand—and that is progress.

As I mentioned earlier, engineering has affected practically every aspect of human survival and engineering history dates back to the introduction of the wheel. The transition from stone to metal can also be credited to yet another feat of engineering. Such accomplishments have never ceased to be amazing, contributing to every culture of the world. The Greeks are worthy of much praise for their invention and development of aqueducts; to the glory that was Rome we applaud and marvel at the architectural achievements of the Pantheon, the colosseums, and cathedrals, and we should not forget yet another wonder of the world—the Egyptian pyramids. Many of man's triumphs and conquests must be credited to the realization of engineering goals. America is not without its own success stories as our country has also had its own engineering heroes in the likes of Lillian Moller Gilbreth who took great strides in time motion research; Washington Augustus Roebling, the first engineer to use caissons and steel cables to construct the Brooklyn Bridge—the bridge they said could not be built; Ole Singstad, the gentleman who magnificently engineered the design of the Holland Tunnel; Elwood Mead, builder of the Hoover Dam; Robert H. Goddard, who dared to explore the frontier of space; and Grace Murray Hopper whose contributions to computer programing were so significant that the U.S. Navy would not allow her to retire—even at age 78.

Another invention worthy of comment comes from the University of Pennsylvania. Known as the ENIAC, it has been hailed as the father of the modern electronic computer and has been named as one of the top 10 engineering achievements in the past 50 years. Needless to say, engineers are worthy of recognition and we, the people of the 20th century are indebted to these individuals who have dedicated themselves to efficiency and progress.

On this occasion, I want to recognize Dr. Joseph Bordogna of the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Bordogna has been selected as the 1984 Engineer of the Year, an honor of which he is indeed worthy and most deserving. Known for his research in optical and radio communications, electro-optic recording materials, holographic television, and various miraculous laser projects such as a laser-equipped cane which allows blind people to see where they are going, Dr. Bordogna's accomplishments are many and he is honored for his distinguished career as both an engineer and an educator. He continues the great engineering tradition of the University of Pennsylvania.

I congratulate and compliment Dr. Bordogna on his personal and professional achievements and extend my praise to all engineers for their most spectacular and awe inspiring achievements, from which all of society has benefited. Said William Shakespeare: "We know what we are, but not what we may be." Seeing and helping us achieve "what we may be" remains the fundamental challenge of engineering.●

MORTGAGE-BACKED BONDS

HON. JOHN McCAIN

OF ARIZONA

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I joined with my colleague from Oregon (Mr. AuCoin), to introduce a resolution critical for the future of our Nation's homebuilding industry. This resolution seeks to protect a truly innovative method of financing. One which has helped restore vigor to the housing market. I refer to mortgage-backed bonds, or a program known in the trade as builders bonds.

The use of these bonds began around 1980. The economy was sliding into recession. With interest rates hovering near 20 percent, savings and loans and mortgage banks either would not or could not provide the capital needed by our homebuilders. Housing starts were falling sharply. At the depth of the recession they fell 50 percent, to their lowest level since World War II. Homebuilders searched desperately for a mechanism which would stave off disaster. They came up with mortgage-backed bonds.

Mr. Speaker, let me briefly explain how this program works. A builder sells many homes, taking mortgages on them. He then transfers these notes to a wholly owned finance company which uses them to collateralize a bond issue. Under long established tax principles, builders do not pay taxes on the proceeds from these bonds because, eventually, they must be redeemed. Unlike traditional mortgage-backed securities, investors in these bonds do not purchase a share in the mortgage pool. Rather, they purchase debt secured by mortgages.

In addition, because the builder retains ownership of the mortgages, he is eligible for installment sales tax treatment similar to that of the automobile or appliance industry. The builder pays taxes only when he actually receives the principal from the mortgages. The end result of this program is a maximization of investment capital.

This arrangement benefits the homebuilder by providing him with badly needed new sources of reliable and affordable home mortgage funds. This in turn has direct benefits for the homebuyer. Lower financing costs, better access to the capital markets, and tax deferrals enable homebuilders to offer lower sales prices with interest rates one-half percent below the average rate. These cost savings help middle-class Americans realize the dream of homeownership far sooner in their lives than would be possible without them.

Mr. Speaker, I must question the wisdom of any attack on this program. A recent study by a major public accounting firm indicates that restrictions on the builder's bonds program would bring in $85 million in taxes. This is at a time when homebuilding is recovering from its worst years since World War II. The industry, which has led our country out of every recession since the 1950's, is witnessing a 60-percent increase in activity over its low point of 1982. Now is not the time to tamper with homebuilding.

We must resist any effort to stifle the creativity and innovation now underway in the mortgage finance field. I urge my colleagues to join us in protecting the housing industry.●

SHRINERS HOSPITALS FOR CRIPPLED CHILDREN

HON. JOSEPH G. MINISH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to salute a dear friend of mine, Mr. George Stringfellow.

Mr. Stringfellow enjoys a fulfilling and rich life—a life in which he has devoted much of his time and energy to others.

As an active member and a former imperial potentate of the Shriners, Mr. Stringfellow is justifiably proud of the Shriners Hospitals for Crippled Children. In the following speech, delivered by Mr. Stringfellow, he recalls the Shriners' meeting in 1920 when the imperial council passed the resolution establishing 19 orthopedic hospitals and 3 burn institutes.

This is an interesting piece of Americana history and I would like to take the opportunity to reprint it here:

Chairman James H. Shacklett, officers and members of your distinguished board, Imperial Sir Jacob Wingerter and beautiful ladies:

Thank you for your gracious introduction and for the warmth of your reception. I wish to especially thank Illustrious Sir Edward E. Buckley, the board's competent secretary, for safe and comfortable transportation to this meeting.

It is a privilege to speak to you for a few moments on how Shriners Hospitals came into being and their accomplishments to date.

At the 46th Imperial Council Session of the Shrine held in Portland, Oreg., in 1920, W. Freeland Kendrick, Imperial Potentate recommended that the council adopt a resolution authorizing the establishment of a hospital for crippled children to be supported by the membership of the Shrine of North America on an annual per capita basis. This hospital to be known as Shriners Hospital for Crippled Children and to become a goal for the Shrine organization beyond the mere pursuit of happiness.

It is difficult for us today to believe that any Shriner would have objected to the hospital idea, but there were some detractors. Even highly respected members of the Imperial Council raised questions concerning "practicability," "the qualifications of the child" and supposed "hasty legislation."

When opponents to the proposed hospital program had finished speaking, Noble Forrest Adair of Yaarab Temple rose and delivered what has since become known as the famous "bubbles speech"—the speech that is credited with having moved the Representatives later to vote unanimously for the proposal. Noble Adair said: "I was lying in bed yesterday morning, about 4 o'clock in the Multnomah Hotel, and some poor fellow who had strayed away from the rest of the band—and he was a magnificent performer on a baritone horn—stood down there under the window for 25 minutes playing 'I Am Only Blowing Bubbles.' After awhile, when I dropped back into a peaceful sleep, I dreamed of a little crippled children's hospital run by the Scottish Rite Fraternity in Atlanta, Ga., which has been visited by a number of the members of this Imperial Council, and I thought of the wandering minstrel of the early morning, and I wondered if there were not a deep significance for Shriners in the tune that he was playing, 'I Am Only Blowing Bubbles.' "

After considerable discourse on the merits of a hospital, Noble Adair continued: "I want to see this thing started. Let us lay aside the soap and water and stop blowing bubbles, and get down to brass tacks."

Imperial Potentate Kendrick spoke: "Nobles, just let me say two things and then let's vote on it. I want to say to you that I have listened to Forrest Adair and these splendid men place this proposition before you. The time has come when we should do something big. And what can you do as big as to furnish a hospital for a poor little crippled child? God put it here on earth and it is up to us to help it."

Imperial Sir Melish was recognized and said: "I think the duty of us all—the duty of myself first—is that if action is to be taken today, as it is, upon this matter, that we want to go before the world showing that the vote was unanimous, and that is the way I am going to vote."

There were many calls for the question. When it was put, Imperial Potentate Kendrick's resolution passed unanimously.

The passage of that resolution has resulted in the establishment of 19 orthopedic hospitals and 3 burns institutes in which 264,203 crippled and burned children have been cured or substantially helped to date (without cost to parents, children or guardians). That number—264,203—approximates the combined populations of the cities of Erie, Harrisburg, and Reading, Pa.

Fifty years ago the Shrine operated 15 hospitals with total operating expenses for the year ending March 3, 1933, of $963,000—roughly $62,400 per unit. The 1983 operating expenses for the 21 hospitals is $96 million—roughly $4.5 million per unit. In 1984 that figure will be $5 million each for 22 hospitals including the new Tampa unit. Since 1922 Shriners hospitals have spent more than $660 million in aiding crippled and burned children.

Without the worthy objective of aiding crippled and burned children or an objective which fills a similar need, our Fraternity would not enjoy its present prestige and public acceptance.

The late Fred Van Deventer, Shrine historian and author of the history of the Shrine called "Parade to Glory," had this to say about Imperial Sir W. Freeland Kendrick: "The election in 1919 of W. Freeland Kendrick as Imperial Potentate, set off a chain reaction that was to give the Shrine a soul—a soul so big that it passeth understanding, a soul so big that in the light of 30 years of service it transformed a playground for Masons into a fraternity of love.

"It is likely that in the whole history of humankind there never has been an undertaking by any group of men that was created so suddenly or developed and perfected so quickly as the soul of the Shriners—their hospitals for crippled children."

In adopting the Kendrick resolution, the Shrine did indeed "do something big."●

VESTAVIA HILLS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE PRESENTS "LAND OF OPPORTUNITY AWARDS"

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, for the last 2 years, the Vestavia Hills Chamber of Commerce has presented the "Land of Opportunity Awards" to first-generation immigrants with citizenship intentions who are working and demonstrating by example that the United States is still the "Land of Opportunity." Last year I was privileged to have been given the honor of presenting the award to six nominees. They included Tuan A. Le from Vietnam, who arrived in the United States in 1975, acquired a B.S. degree in mathematics, a B.S. degree in English, is working on an M.S. degree in mathematics and electrical engineering, and is employed at Rust International Corp. in Birmingham; Frank Petho, who came from Domborar, Hungary in 1953, graduated from Rutgers University, and is presently a project engineer for Turner Construction Co. in Birmingham; Dana Darlene Idol, who came from Panama to this country in 1958 and is currently credit manager for the Yielding Stores in Birmingham; Prem Tagra from India, who is an engineer with the Rust International Corp.; Galal Abdulla, an Egyptian native who operates a riding school at Oak Mountain State Park; and Tien Le, who came from Vietnam, graduated from Homewood High School at the age of 16 and received a 4-year premedical school scholarship to Birmingham-Southern College.

I was proud to present the "Land of Opportunity Award" to these six individuals who are living proof that America continues to be a land of opportunity and a beacon of democracy around the world.

I would like to commend those responsible for initiating the presentation of these awards, particularly Mr. Herc Levine, committee chairman of the "Land of Opportunity Awards," who was instrumental in turning his lifelong dream of recognizing those who came here seeking freedom to live and work and worship as they wish into a reality.

The Vestavia Hills Chamber of Commerce is due to be commended for establishing this recognition to exemplify that our democracy remains the land of opportunity, a vibrant and growing Nation whose values of personal liberty, hard work, religious freedom, the importance of family and neighborhoods, contribute to make this Nation the land of opportunity for all.●

TRIBUTE TO ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to welcome again to Washington, his Eminence the Archbishop Iakovos, Primate of the Greek Orthodox Diocese of North and South America. It is indeed a special honor today, because this year marks the 25th year that His Eminence has served as spiritual leader for the entire Greek Orthodox population of the Western Hemisphere.

Archbishop Iakovos is well known here in Washington and throughout the world as a strong defender of religious and civil rights and as a prominent spokesman for humanitarian causes. His leadership of the campaign to assist Greek-Cypriot refugees, following the invasion of Cyprus by Turkish armed forces in 1974, won the hearts and minds of Americans of all religious and ethnic backgrounds. I know this personally, because the Archbishop's efforts so convinced me that I sought and won $15 million in foreign aid for the Greek-Cypriot refugees, 200 percent more than the administration had requested.

It is my fervent hope that the Archbishop's courageous stand on behalf of human rights is rewarded by a peaceful settlement in Cyprus. I commend him for his achievements and wish him many more years of success in leading the Greek Orthodox community in the Western Hemisphere.●

TRIBUTE TO MORTON WEBER

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to one of Long Island's finest citizens. Morton Weber, an attorney and partner in the law firm of Weber, Haberman, Gross & Glueck, is widely known throughout Suffolk County, N.Y., because of his unceasing and dedicated involvement in a variety of important causes. It is my privilege to bring the accomplishments of Mort Weber to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. Congress.

Throughout Mort's professional career, he has taken an active interest in enhancing the vitality of Long Island's business community. While many areas of the Nation have been hard hit by recession and unemployment, the economy of Long Island has remained strong. This is a credit to the ingenuity and foresight of our business leaders and to the dedication and hard work of Long Island's workers.

As chairman of the board of the Advancement for Commerce and Industry, Mort has played a critical role in promoting the development and well-being of our business community on Long Island. During Mort's tenure as president of ACI, the organization has grown from an original membership of 38 to over 800 members. Today, ACI has become one of the two largest and most influential business groups on Long Island, primarily due to Mort's tireless and dynamic leadership.

In addition to his service with ACI, Mort has distinguished himself by becoming involved in other activities of importance to the local community. Mort is a trustee of the Farmingdale University Foundation, a member of the American Business Associates, the Long Island Mid-Suffolk Businessmen's Association and the Long Island Coordinating Council.

He has volunteered his time and energy to the American Cancer Society and the Suffolk County Boy Scouts. Most recently, Mort has been appointed Suffolk chairman of the American Diabetes Foundation and Suffolk chairman for the State of Israel Bonds. In fact, Mort will soon be honored at an affair given by the Israel Bond Foundation for his exemplary service in this area.

Throughout his exceptional career characterized by accomplishment after accomplishment, Mort Weber has contributed so much to help make Long Island a better place to live. For this, he deserves our heartfelt gratitude. It is my sincere hope that Mort will continue his outstanding service to the community for many more years.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the family and friends of Mort Weber in paying tribute to this outstanding citizen.●

THE MEXICAN ECONOMY

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, U.S. Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige's advice that Mexico should seek increased foreign direct investment and eliminate export subsidies will only damage our trade relations and further compound the border economic crisis.

If Mexican economy is to achieve stable and diversified growth to overcome its internal problems, it will need the support of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the basic problem is that we have refused to recognize that a strong economy is in our own national self-interest. Instead, the United States has established a protectionist trade bias against a country that is not strong enough to overcome it. This administration believes that Mexico has reached a level of industrial sophistication comparable to Hong Kong or Korea, when in fact it is still struggling with the inevitable problems of Third World development. Because Mexico is not a member of the General Agreement of Tariffs and Trade, it is not provided with the benefits of an injury test in countervailing duty suits against its exports. As a result, if the Commerce Department finds that a Mexican product has been subsidized, a countervailing duty may be levied without determining if the domestic industry has been injured. Unfortunately, U.S. businesses are often protected against exports that are not competitive in the first place.

The administration's unwillingness to address the roots of the border economic crisis has prevented it from making a substantive effort to solve it. The United States is the only technologically advanced nation in the world to share a 2,000-mile border with a developing country, and I do not think I need to remind anyone that the long-term benefits of a strong and stable ally to the south far outweigh any short-term, short-sighted benefits conjured up by the Commerce Department.

Despite obvious economic and cultural ties, the fact of the matter is that the developmental gap between the two countries is wide enough that economic dislocation will be experienced on both sides of the border when a domestic crisis affects either one. Unless Mexico is helped to achieve the type of stability that will allow its economy to grow, U.S. businesses will continue to suffer the efforts of Mexico's internal problems.●

PROVIDING MEDICARE BENEFITS TO THOSE LIVING AND TRAVELING ABROAD

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that will address a very real and common problem faced by the elderly living and traveling overseas. Despite the fact that since 1977, we have entered in arrangements with foreign countries in order to provide social security benefits to those living abroad, we still do not extend the same coverage under medicare. If an elderly individual is overseas and becomes ill, medicare will not pay for health care services. I believe that this is discriminatory, especially in those instances where there is a severe illness that requires prolonged hospital care or medical supervision.

If a medicare beneficiary has worked his or her entire life to contribute to the medicare trust fund in order to be eligible for benefits upon reaching the age of 65, it is patently unfair to deny that same person their benefits if they choose to live or travel overseas.

This issue has been addressed by the House before as part of the 1979 social security amendments. The bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee provided for the President to enter into international agreement with other countries in order to provide for medicare payments overseas. However, this provision was dropped in conference and as a result, did not become law.

We have recognized the inequity of not providing benefits to which the elderly are entitled to under the understanding that their contributions to the system would take care of their health care needs in their retirement years. It is time we act to make this part of the Social Security Act consistent with the 1977 provision that allowed for the payment of social security benefits to those individuals living abroad. Today, there are currently 151,366 retired and disabled workers living outside of the United States who receive $53 million in benefits.

The number of elderly who travel outside the United States each year are sizable. Each and every one of these people could face a health hazard that would require medical treatment that would not be paid for by medicare. Last year, the State Department issued 832,000 individuals over the age of 55 passports. Clearly, this situation is one which could impact upon a large segment of these people.

Medicare coverage under the law today is very limited for those individuals traveling outside the United States. The exceptions for coverage include emergency services while traveling between Canada and the 48 contiguous States and Alaska. It also includes hospital services that are needed while traveling in the United States near a border when a Canadian or Mexican hospital is more accessible than an American hospital.

The provisions of my legislation are simple. The President is authorized to enter into agreements establishing reciprocal arrangements for health care with other countries. Benefits provided under these agreements should be equal to benefits provided to the same eligible individuals in the United States. Due to the often lengthy amount of time that it takes to conclude such agreements, the Secretary of Health and Human Services is authorized to enter in temporary agreements. This will be especially helpful to individuals in countries which provide for dual citizenship, such as Israel and Ireland, which are frequented by large numbers of elderly.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I am inserting the text of this bill into the RECORD.

As an original member of the House Select Committee on Aging, I intend to work for passage of this legislation in any medicare bill that we consider this session. I believe that fairness dictates that we give all medicare beneficiaries their benefits—at home and abroad.

H.R. 4767

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That part C of title XVIII of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

"SEC. 1888. (a) The President is authorized to enter into agreements establishing reciprocal arrangements between the programs established by this title and the program of any foreign country under which similar services are provided directly to entitled individuals or under which insurance is provided to meet all or part of the expenses of entitled individuals for such services.

"(b) Any agreement establishing such a reciprocal arrangement pursuant to this section shall specify—

"(1) the nature and extent of payment to be made to or on behalf of (A) individuals entitled to benefits under this title for services covered under such title when such individuals are present in the foreign country and receive such services from persons who are authorized under the program of that foreign country to furnish them, and (B) individuals entitled to benefits under the program of that foreign country who receive such services in the United States from persons meeting such requirements or conditions as are required under such title;

"(2) such limitations on the nature and duration of services for which payment may be made in one country to individuals entitled to benefits under the program of the other country, as the President deems appropriate, except that no agreement shall authorize any individual to receive benefits in the United States on a reciprocal basis in excess of those provided for individuals entitled to benefits under this title;

"(3) such limitation on entitlement of individuals to benefits on a reciprocal basis under an agreement in the United States and in the foreign country, as the President deems appropriate, except that no agreement shall provide entitlement to benefits under this title in the United States for an individual who does not meet the requirements for entitlement applicable under such title with respect to age or medical condition;

"(4) the methods by which the cost of providing services to persons on a reciprocal basis shall be shared equitably by the persons receiving such services and by the respective programs of the United States and the foreign country; and

"(5) such other provisions, not inconsistent with this section, as the President deems appropriate.

"(c) The Secretary shall make rules and regulations and establish procedures which are reasonable and necessary to implement and administer any agreement which has been entered into in accordance with this section.

"(d) Pending the conclusion of an agreement under this section with a foreign country, the Secretary is authorized to enter into interim arrangements with any hospital in that country which is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, or such other hospitals as the Secretary finds meet health and safety standards equivalent to those required under this title for hospitals in the United States and which are accredited in the foreign country concerned, under which payment may be made for inpatient hospital services, as defined in section 1861, to or on behalf of an individual who is entitled to such benefits under part A of this title. For purposes of making payment under such an interim arrangement, the Secretary shall use whichever of the methods provided for in section 1814(f) he finds appropriate, except that any payments made under part A of this title to the individual or to the hospital shall be reduced to the extent that the individual has no legal obligation to pay for any items or services furnished to such individual by reason of the laws of the foreign country in which the hospital is located or such individual's membership in an insurance plan that provides for payment for such items or services.".●

IN HONOR OF ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I join my colleagues in honoring Archbishop Iakovos on the anniversary of his enthronement as archbishop 25 years ago.

In addition to being involved in every aspect of Greek-American life, religious and secular, Archbishop Iakovos is a world religious leader representing the Greek Orthodox Church and its people throughout the world. He is also a man who has devoted his life to his principles. He has been a staunch advocate of human rights and religious freedom for all people. The archbishop was actively involved in the civil rights movement, and has consistently spoken out against injustice wherever he saw it. The honorary degrees and other honors bestowed on Archbishop Iakovos, including the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1980, cover several pages.

Those of us in Congress of Greek descent are proud to know Archbishop Iakovos and to honor him for his spiritual and secular leadership and for his many accomplishments as leader of the Greek Orthodox Church in America.●

GOOD NEWS FROM ROGER B. SMITH, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD, GENERAL MOTORS CORP.

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to share some very good news with our colleagues regarding the 1983 performance of our Nation's largest automobile manufacturer, General Motors.

In remarks before the National Press Club earlier today, GM chairman of the board, Roger B. Smith, told his audience of a stunning comeback in 1983, when GM enjoyed record earnings and record sales. This performance is a dramatic reversal of losses incurred by the corporation just a few short years ago.

More importantly for GM workers and for GM communities, including those that I represent, GM is initiating this year a profit-sharing program which will provide $322 million for the 531,000 hourly and salaried GM employees around the country.

Mr. Smith provided some very important information regarding the current status of his part of our domestic auto industry, and some insights into the times ahead. I commend his remarks to all of our colleagues:

REMARKS BY ROGER B. SMITH, CHAIRMAN, GENERAL MOTORS CORP.

Thanks very much, John [Fogarty, correspondent, San Francisco Chronicle, and president, National Press Club].

It's a great honor to be invited back to the National Press Club.

And I'm enormously flattered by today's turnout.

John, I want to congratulate you on taking up your new duties as Club president.

Having a Fogarty succeed Don Byrne has led to some talk of an Irish Mafia takeover.

But I'm told those rumors are false.

I have been asked, however, to announce that henceforth the Club will serve only Guinness on tap—and you can buy any whiskey you want, as long as it's Irish.

I'm sorry I'm going to miss the big Inaugural Ball at the new Club Ballroom on Saturday.

In fact, I'm sorry I'm missing the new ballroom—period.

It's going to be great when it's finished—one of the best looking press clubs in America.

But during the renovation, it's been more like the Beirut Hilton.

Through all the construction, the Club has carried on valiantly.

You've kept to a busy schedule—despite the pounding of jackhammers and the vagaries of new plumbing.

We understand that kind of spirit in the American auto industry.

We, too, have been working while a renovation was under way.

But in our case, it was the renovation of an entire industry.

Even as our critics were calling American automaking a dying industry and trying to bury us, we were creating new products and putting up new plants.

We were busy improving product quality and reviving our sales.

At General Motors, we also managed to move a few of the bigger boxes around on the organization chart.

Our critics aside, we've begun a kind of industrial miracle in the American auto industry—a miracle that's still ongoing.

What's been happening reminds me of the guy who pulled his truck off the highway and went into a roadside diner to have lunch.

He ordered a hamburger, a cup of coffee, and a piece of pie.

Just as his lunch was set before him, three rough-looking guys in leather jackets, motorcycle helmets, and boots entered the diner and sat down beside him at the counter.

One hood grabbed his hamburger and ate it.

Another picked up his coffee and drank it.

The third tasted his pie, then mashed the rest of it with his fist.

The man said nothing, but got up, paid the cashier for the food, and walked out.

The three guys in leather jackets turned to the cashier, and one of them said:

"Not much of a man, is he?"

"No, and he's not much of a driver, either," said the cashier.

"He just ran his truck over three motorcycles."

The American auto industry has made an equally dramatic move.

We've begun what can only be called a stunning comeback—and I'll have some hard evidence of that to offer in a moment.

Now the question all the world wants to know—and all of you have been asking in your articles and columns and on-camera reports—seems to be this:

Can we sustain success?

Can the American auto industry survive prosperity without falling back into the bad habits that helped bring on the hard times?

I'm here to tell you we can.

And one of the things that's going to help us is a new program that's about to pay off very handsomely.

More about that later.

First, let's get to that hard evidence I promised.

Our results for 1983 are now final, and I'm very pleased to announce today that General Motors last year earned an all-time record of $3.7 billion on record sales of $74.6 billion.

The previous records were set in 1978, when net income was $3.5 billion, and in 1979, when sales were $66.3 billion.

Earnings per share for 1983 were $11.84, but were not a record.

The record is $12.24 per share in 1978, when fewer shares were outstanding.

The 1983 results compared with net income of $963 million, or $3.09 per share, on sales of $60.0 billion in 1982.

But to really understand the extent of our progress, you might look back to our 1980 results which showed a loss of $762 million.

The results we're announcing today—just three years later—are an incredible $4.5 billion improvement over that figure, although our unit sales increased less than 10 percent.

So the recovery at General Motors is real—and it's very demonstrable.

What made it such a good year?

Our 1983 performance was a reflection of many things.

Right at the top of the list I'd put the new spirit of cooperation and the dedication of our GM people.

It's certainly true that we did get a lift from the rising economy, but our improved operating performance was the key.

For example, if we had operated in 1983 at our 1983 volume—but at our 1978 performance rates—we would have barely broken even last year.

As proud as we are of our 1983 performance, I must emphasize that inflation made the year seem even better than it was.

If you adjust the data for inflation, you see that we still have a long way to go to achieve meaningful competitive results.

As much as we have accomplished to restore our competitive edge, still more remains to be done.

For example, our 1983 earnings were equal to 5.0 percent of sales, compared with 10 percent of sales we achieved in the mid-Sixties.

Still, we've made tremendous progress—and we're not done yet.

The recovery of the U.S. auto industry to date represents one of the greatest comebacks in American business history.

And our stockholders, our employes, our suppliers—everyone who has a stake in General Motors—will share in our success.

In fact, to a certain degree, I think I can say that all of America will share.

For example, in 1983, our stockholders received $892 million in dividends.

And just yesterday, the board declared a first-quarter dividend payment totaling $316 million.

Our suppliers, who traditionally account for 50 percent of our sales dollar, received about $37 billion in 1983.

Our GM dealers shared in our success through the increased business created for them.

In 1983, we supplied these dealers with 7.8 million cars and trucks worldwide to sell and service.

Through our 1983 tax payments of all kinds, state, local, federal, and foreign governments received about $5.8 billion.

Uncle Sam's share of this was more than half.

Our GM management also benefited.

For the first time in four years, we earned funds for the GM Bonus Plan—some $180 million.

And our 700,000 employes worldwide received $19.3 billion in salaries and wages—and about $5.5 billion in health care, pensions, and other benefits.

Finally—one of the things we are most proud of this year—GM will be sharing profits with its hourly and non-executive salaried employes under a new program.

An unprecedented $322 million—nearly a third of a billion dollars—will be shared with 531,000 eligible U.S. hourly and salaried employes.

No other company anywhere in the world, at any time in history, has ever distributed such a large amount of profits to its employes.

The $322 million we will pay out in profit sharing is more than the total earnings of all but the top 45 companies on Fortune's list of the 500 largest U.S. corporations.

Our profit-sharing checks will be distributed to our employes in early March.

For the eligible employe who worked a normal schedule all year, a share in GM's 1983 profits will mean about $640.

Those hourly employes with average overtime last year will be receiving $700—and those with heavy overtime, considerably more.

In cities with a large concentration of GM people, the impact of our profit-sharing plan on the local economies will be substantial and immediate.

In the Greater Detroit area, for example, about 137,000 eligible employes will share approximately $67 million.

Much of the income that's distributed will give these local economies a measurable and much needed boost as it multiplies through the system.

But much will also be saved, and that will help these economies, too, since it will add to the funds available for local borrowing and investment.

In fact, one of the best features of the GM Profit Sharing Plan is the opportunity it gives employes to save.

Employes can invest their profit-sharing dollars in a tax-deferred savings plan—the biggest plan of its kind in the industry.

Under the plan, they can invest in GM common stock, in a guaranteed income fund, or a combination of the two.

This new plan will be in addition to the Employe Stock Ownership Plan, which also serves as a vehicle for employes to acquire GM common stock.

So the implementation of the GM Profit Sharing Plan marks a new milestone in employe relations.

The plan makes the corporation and its employes partners in the success of the business.

And—thanks to the opportunity to turn profit-sharing benefits into stock—the plan offers employes a bigger partnership in the business itself.

It represents a further democratization of the workplace, a true sharing of the ownership.

As Bert Metzger, president of the Profit Sharing Research Foundation, has said, through profit sharing "we have an opportunity today . . . to create a society where we do not have concentrated ownership, but diffused ownership among millions of our people."

So, in a very real sense, profit sharing offers our employes a share of the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow and a piece of the future, itself.

And we plan to work closely with Donald Ephlin of the United Auto Workers as we go forward with this.

Now, lest it sound like we invented it, I want to acknowledge that profit sharing has been around for a long time.

In North America, it dates back nearly 200 years to Albert Gallatin, secretary of the Treasury under Presidents Jefferson and Madison.

According to the records, Gallatin instituted the first North American profit sharing plan in 1797 at his glass works in New Geneva, Pennsylvania.

Today, there are an estimated 19 million U.S. employees covered by profit sharing plans in approximately 450,000 American companies.

While many companies with unions share profits, most very large unionized companies do not.

So the entry of GM into the field is significant—not only because the size of our initial payout is unprecedented, but also because we're one of the largest unionized companies around.

But over and above our own experience, I'd like to tell you why I think profit sharing is an idea that's right for the auto industry and right for America—especially now.

In my view, profit sharing is an idea whose time has come.

Perhaps the best reason is that we've been changing the way we run our companies in America.

To make the most of all our employes' capabilities, more and more companies have changed to a participative style of management. We've set aside the old authoritarian style of leadership and gone to a teamwork approach.

This was certainly one of the main goals behind our recent organization changes at General Motors.

It is our firm belief that, as more employes share in the burdens of decision making, so should they share in the rewards when those decisions pay off.

Our free enterprise system has always been based on the idea of entrepreneurship—what I like to call responsibility, risk, and reward.

But over the years, as we moved away from family-owned farms and small partnerships in America, the direct relationship between responsibility, risk, and reward became clouded.

The idea of personal involvement in the fortunes of the enterprise began to be lost.

Today, the vast majority of Americans are not engaged in partnerships or small family farms.

They are wage-earners—often in very large corporations.

As such, they're not directly rewarded by profits, and therefore not particularly motivated by profits.

In fact, some of them even see profit as a negative—as someone else's income, as something which reduces their own share of the pie!

But profit sharing puts entrepreneurship back in the free enterprise system.

It restores to every employe a stake in the business—literally makes him or her an entrepreneur.

It offers a tangible and substantial reward for a job well done and an incentive for even closer cooperation in the years ahead.

Most importantly, it counteracts an attitude of indifference we often find—like the sailor who was resting in his bunk when one of his buddies ran into the compartment shouting, "Hey, Mac, hurry up, get going—the ship is sinking!"

Mac continue to lie in his bunk and calmly said, "So what? What do I care? It ain't my ship!"

More and more today we're learning that the ship belongs to us all.

Profit sharing makes that relationship clear.

It strengthens the commonality of interests among all the stakeholders in a business, be they managers, employes, or stockholders.

It moves them toward a common goal, and encourages the participation of all.

Best of all, the record shows that the whole thing works.

Employes in profit sharing businesses do tend to be more productive.

They help create a bigger pie—so they can get a bigger slice.

As a result, the businesses themselves typically perform better and have more to share with their stakeholders.

Now this is the right time for the idea of profit sharing, because American business is locked in the fight of its life.

We're involved in a tough race against international competition, and we need all the help we can get.

From a financial standpoint, the beauty of profit sharing is that it makes compensation sensitive to the ups and downs of the business cycle.

With lower fixed costs, companies can offer employes a bigger share of the rewards when times are good—and more job security when times are bad.

Most important, profit sharing tends to be non-inflationary.

Profits are shared because there are improved efficiencies.

Thus, the labor cost per unit does not go up.

But the purchasing power of the workers does—importantly.

And the incentive for further improved efficiencies increases sharply.

Profit sharing is by no means a panacea.

But it is a very important tool—along with good management, advanced technology, and all the rest—in the effort to make America more competitive.

We at General Motors are very pleased that we now have full use of this new tool in our operations.

We believe it will help us sustain and improve our performance over the long term.

And we believe it has the potential to help our country deal with some of its tough economic problems as well.

Now, I've said on several occasions that we've made progress in re-establishing the competitive edge in the auto industry.

That progress is real—but it could be overshadowed if the economy falters.

The scale of the federal deficits built in under existing legislation is risky.

Clearly these deficits must be reduced.

The earlier they are reduced, the better it will be for the sustainability of the economic recovery and the auto business.

So it's important to begin to work on a down payment toward resolving this problem.

The government has to act, but so does the private sector.

To reduce the deficit, the government must reduce public spending more than it has—that is a certainty.

But our greatest hope in achieving a balanced budget over the coming years is a strong and growing economy.

Any fiscal or monetary policy that would slow that growth appreciably—or even throw it into reverse—would be counter productive.

Budget deficits would grow worse.

And that is where this great nation's private sector comes in.

Private sector initiatives alone cannot reduce the deficit.

But they can surely help.

Our government can create a healthy climate in which the economy can gain strength and grow—but it can contribute little of itself to the growth.

Only we in private business and private industry can make our economy grow and keep it growing—through our initative, our innovation, our productivity.

That is why I consider the success of our employe profit sharing plan at GM so important—because it stands as an example of what a group of private citizens, engaged in private enterprise, can accomplish together when they know that their combined efforts to increase productivity will be rewarded with a just and equitable share of the profits.

Whatever progress is achieved through private initiatives of this kind and of many other shapes and sizes will have two rather significant benefits:

First, it will reduce the calls on the public purse for further government-funded programs.

Second, it will create a climate of growth and prosperity, in which the hard political and economic decisions about budget deficits will be easier to make.

Yet Washington should not assume the hard decisions will be washed away by prosperity.

Instead, policymakers here should have faith that if they make some of the tough choices, growth and prosperity will make those choices easier to live with.

GM's announcement today that we're sharing our profits in unprecedented amounts with our employee is further proof that our system of private- and public-sector cooperation is a very good one.

It's a system that works and responds to change.

Today, General Motors and its employes become partners in success.

Over the years, as more employes use profit sharing to buy and own GM stock, there will be a further democratization of the workplace and a beneficial effect on the direction of our corporation.

It is our hope that as other companies adopt profit sharing and build a flexible component into employes' total compensation, our country will become increasingly competitive.

Unless we move toward such arrangements, we will continue to be forced to meet the economic ups and downs with changes in employment and plant utilization that undermine our ability to advance the competitiveness of American industry.

Only by advancing can we sustain our vitality, our employment levels, and the ability of American industry to close the competitive gap with other nations and to share the life-enriching fruits of prosperity with the American people.

Thank you very much.●

CHILD CARE PROGRAMS NEEDED

HON. SALA BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, over the past several decades, American women have been entering the labor force in record numbers. An increasing percentage of women entering the labor market are working mothers. In 1980, nearly 65 percent of mothers with school-age children were employed.

Unfortunately, in the United States, the number of child-care alternatives available to working mothers has not kept pace with the changing work patterns of American women. In most other industrialized nations, the contribution made by women to the economy is recognized through the provision of available and affordable child care programs. We must move quickly to fill this gap.

Along with my colleagues, PATRICIA SCHROEDER and GERALDINE FERRARO, I have introduced legislation, H.R. 4193, the School Facilities Child Care Act, to establish a child care program for children who have become known as "latchkey children." It is an inventive, cost-effective proposal which will encourage the Government, local communities and parents to cooperate in the creation of a new child care initiative. I urge my colleagues to examine this proposal and to join the 63 other Members who have cosponsored the School Facilities Child Care Act.

I highly recommend the following article which outlines the difficult dilemma faced by working mothers and forcefully illustrates the dismal state of our Nation's child care system.

WE LIBERATED MOTHERS AREN'T

(By Ann Crittenden)

The women's revolution in the United States is only half won. The first shoe has dropped; more women than ever before are working outside the home and breaking into the previously closed ranks of well-paid professionals. But the other shoe—the freeing of women from the burdens associated with responsibility for raising the next generation—has yet to fall. This unfinished business is a serious obstacle in their paths as they try to take advantage of their new opportunities.

The great paradox in this country is that while more mothers are entering the job market, almost no cultural or institutional changes in the way children are supposed to be reared have occurred. Women are taking on new jobs and getting little relief from their old ones. Sooner or later almost every working mother has to face the hard truth—that she is either raising her children in her spare time or short-circuiting her career, often by opting out for several years or by settling for a less demanding job. This dilemma helps explain the wage gap between working men and women, which has been growing rather than shrinking in the United States in the past 10 years despite all of women's so-called gains.

Looked at this way, it is not surprising that few women or men are happy with the current situation, and that the cries of confusion, resentment and backlash are getting louder. But the women's revolution wasn't naive, as some now seem to be suggesting; it was just incomplete.

It doesn't have to be like this. The problem is not the result of some inevitable, unsolvable conflict between work and family. It is a result of the fact that the United States does less than virtually any other country in the industrialized world to make life easier for working parents. We have less maternity leave, less job flexibility, less day care. And thanks largely to such policies, women in many comparable countries earn more, proportionately, then women in the United States.

In 1980, the median earnings of full-time female workers in the United States were 59 percent of the male wage, down from 64 percent in 1955, according to a study by Columbia University sociologist Sheila B. Kamerman. In contrast, Swedish women earned more than 90 percent of average male earnings, up from 73 percent in 1970. In Britain, women's wages as a percent of men's increased from 63 percent in 1970 to 73 percent in 1979 and in Italy, women's wages in manufacturing have risen from 70 percent of male earnings in 1960 to 84 percent in 1980. The gap in the United States is not only greater, it is widening, unlike the trend in every other industrialized nation. Women's rhetoric may be louder in this country, but European women go home with more equal paychecks.

This is not to argue that different social policies would solve all of women's problems; women in France, Britain and Italy still suffer from second-class status. And greater social support for working parents would still not solve the deeper problem of how anyone with family responsibilities can compete on the highest levels of our institutions, where workaholics with virtually no private lives often set the pace.

But there is no doubt that a set of practical and even inexpensive reforms could eliminate much of the conflict that women now feel between careers and child-rearing. Babies and work can be combined for 90 percent or more jobs, and once they are, women will be in a better position to confront the more intractable problems, such as the driven climate at the top of most institutions or the reluctance of most men to assume a fair share of household responsibilities.

The dream that men were going to share in the cooking, cleaning and diapering as their mates began to share the commute was only one of the feminist hopes of a decade ago that have not exactly come to pass. A brief look at the women's agenda of the late 1960s and early 1970s illustrates, in fact, how few of the changes that were going to liberate women from the choice between child-rearing and economic freedom have been made.

Long maternity leaves were going to become routine. Companies were going to set up on-site day-care center, so mothers could count on well-monitored child-care arrangements while they worked. Unions were going to push for flexible working hours, more part-time jobs and job sharing, so that women with small children could continue their careers. Federal day care was being debated in Congress, and a bill financing centers around the country was close to passage.

Schools would introduce before- and after-school programs to accommodate working parents.

It was always assumed that as women began to move into the workforce and up in their careers, society would have to adjust its child-care arrangements. After all, in the old days everyone helped care for the kids, and the spirit of the late 1960s and early 1970s argued that we'd all be better off if we moved back to that vision of extended parenting again.

So what happened? Almost nothing. Despite the fact that the great majority of women of childbearing age are working (including almost half of women with children under 6 years of age), almost 60 percent of working women will have no paid maternity leave of more than a few days. According to studies by Columbia's Kamerman, only about 40 percent of American female workers have the equivalent of the six-week paid disability leave usually considered desirable by doctors, and standard in other countries. The percentage is so low because disability insurance covering childbirth—providing for paid leave to remain at home with an infant—is required in only five states. And most of the women who opt for and are permitted to take an unpaid leave of absence for childbirth do not have a clear-cut right to return to their job.

Day care remains a seemingly Utopian goal. Twelve years ago, a comprehensive day-care bill was passed by Congress, authorizing roughly $2 billion in federal payments to states and cities for the establishment of day-care facilities. But the bill was vetoed by President Nixon, not for budgetary considerations but political ones. Day care was anathema to the right wing of the Republican Party, which was challenging Nixon in 1972. Columnist James J. Kilpatrick had called the bill the "boldest . . . scheme ever advanced for the Sovietization of American youth." In his veto message, Nixon tried to disarm such critics by condemning the "communal approach to child rearing over and against the family-centered approach." It was "one of the most controversial veto messages of the Nixon presidency," according to Gilbert Steiner of the Brookings Institution.

When the bill was reintroduced the following year, a virulent mail campaign frightened all but a handful of congressmen away, and the legislation has never gotten anywhere since. As a result, public day care is almost nonexistent in this country. By one count, there are currently less than half a million publicly supported day-care places available in the entire United States—not enough to serve the needs of New York City alone.

The federal government has not even established minimum national standards for private day-care facilities as it does for hospitals and nursing homes. And only a tiny number of companies have set up day-care centers in the workplace.

Finding adequate child-care arrangements has become an expensive, exhausting scramble for working parents, many of whom settle for less than satisfactory "parking places" for their children during the day. Columbia sociologist Kamerman has found that most families have to rely on a jerry-built system of two to three different child-care arrangements a day for each pre-school child. It should hardly be suprising that many mothers decide that the struggle isn't worth it and drop out of the job market. I know experienced corporate lawyers, economists, journalists, administrator, and lobbyists who have made that decision.

For those women, and millions more, the answer could be more part-time jobs and flexible working schedules, but these too now seem more remote than ever. With hordes of recent college graduates desperate for work on any terms, and economic uncertainty breeding a new conservatism among those who do have jobs, companies have little incentive to make life easier for women.

Both men and women feel the lack of support for working parents, as the accounts of numerous divorced and separated fathers testify. A recent survey of single working fathers by Geoffrey L. Greif, an instructor of social work at Sidenor University in Philadelphia, revealed that more than three-fourths of them reported problems in juggling their time between jobs and children. Many admitted that they were spending fewer hours in the office as a result.

But there is no question that the burden still falls heaviest on women. According to Joseph H. Pleck, director of the Wellesley College Center for Research of Women, "there is good evidence that men's time spent on housework and child care is increasing, probably particularly in families with young children." One study conducted by Thomas Juster of the Institute for Social Research at the University of Michigan found that men age 25 to 44 spend an average of 14.1 hours per week on housework and child care in 1981 up from 11.8 hours in 1965. Yet women of the same age, most of whom are now working outside the home, spent 31.8 hours on the job at home, down from 45.9 hours in 1965.

"Working wives do less housework than homemakers, but they still do the vast bulk of what needs to be done," concludes a new book called "American Couples," by sociologists Philip Blumstein and Pepper Schwartz "Husbands of woman who work help out more than husbands of homemakers, but their contribution is not impressive. Even if a husband is unemployed, he does much less houswork than a wife who puts in a 40-hour week."

Years ago, before women began to enter the job market in large numbers, feminists often pointed out that in Russia, women had achieved more professional status than in the United States. Some men liked to counter that this could not be considered liberation, since Russian women still had to perform the traditional chores. It seems that at least American women have arrived at the same level of liberation as their Russian sisters.

Some have taken the current "who's minding the children" dilemma as a pretext for a 1950s style attack on the very notion of working mothers. A few months ago, the editor of a well-known liberal magazine confided to this reporter, who had just told him that she planned not to work full-time during her baby's first two years, that "our position is that mothers should stay at home."

Rather than retreat to the attitudes of 30 years ago, however, American women need to recognize that they can have, if not all of it, at least most of it. Rather than give up one or the other of their dual roles, working mothers need to demand some help with them, along the lines of the European system.

Almost every other industrialized country has developed "a plethora of public and private support systems which are designed to ease the growing tension between work and family life," according to Sylvia Hewlitt of the United Nations Association who is writing a book on the subject. Fully 75 countries have statutory provisions that guarantee a woman the right to leave employment for childbirth, protect her job while she is on leave and provide a cash benefit which is, on average, equal to five months' full pay. In Sweden, either parent can opt to take a nine months' leave upon the birth of a child, at 90 percent of salary, and be assured of claiming the same or a similar job on their return.

Even Britain, in the midst of its worst economic period since the Great Depression, has improved its child-care benefits recently. By law, employes have to be granted a minimum of six weeks of maternity leave at 90 percent of earnings.

Comprehensive day-care systems have been part of the European scene for years, even in such "pro-family" Catholic countries as France and Italy. A major reason is that these nations suffered a severe labor shortage after World War II and, as in the United States during World War II, policies were put in place to make it easier for women to join the labor force. Also, many European countries have decided that it should be national policy to encourage more births at a time when their populations have leveled off.

The East European countries provide government day care from infancy and in Western Europe many of the same benefits prevail. In several countries, the majority of 3- to 6-year-olds are in free public pre-school programs that last the working day. In France, 95 percent of this age group and 32 percent of 2-year-olds are in free public programs. Three-fourths of West German and 70 percent of Italian 3- to 6-year-olds are in similar schools. Many European countries routinely allow parents leave from work to care for sick children. And in Sweden, parents are entitled by law to work a six-hour day, with pay adjusted accordingly, until their child is 8 years old.

European schools have also adapted to the needs of working parents in ways that American institutions have not. American schools still function on a day that lets out in the early or mid-afternoon—a schedule better suited to the days when the United States was an agricultural society and children were needed to help with farm chores. In France, most public elementary schools provide free supplementary programs both before and after regular school hours and during vacations.

In "High School," the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching's recent report on American secondary education, Ernest L. Boyer writes that in the Soviet Union, China, East Germany and Japan, the school year averages 240 days and the school day lasts from six to eight hours. The typical school year in the United States is 178 days long, and the average school day is five hours and 35 minutes. Much of the worst scrambling American parents go through is in arranging their children's after-school agendas. But in Europe, school-sponsored athletics, play groups and other programs offer children supervised activities while Mom and Dad are still at work.

It would be naive to argue that if the United States adopted the European model, all the problems of working parents and their children would vanish. As the American workplace is now structured, there is not enough time in the day for one person, or even two high achievers, to properly love and nourish a child and race for the top. In practice, that has meant that mothers have pulled up short of the finish line. A look around most offices, from the corporate suite to the newsroom to the inner sanctums of government, confirm that most of the fast-track women there are either unmarried, childless or women whose children are grown.

There is no ready answer to the ultimate problem of how a woman—or man, for that matter—who wants a family life can compete for a room at the top with the driven. But that problem should not be confused with the practical problems most working parents face. Most careers are not in the fast lane, and they can be combined quite satisfactorily with child rearing if more supportive social policies are adopted.

Nor would these policies bankrupt the nation. Some would cost nothing. Most productivity experts believe that individuals enjoying shorter work weeks or more flexible work schedules often more than make up for their hours away from the job in improved productivity. Cafeteria-style fringe benefit packages, allowing employees to choose those benefits that fit their specific needs, are already in place at such corporations as TRW and American Can, where parents can trade some traditional benefits for the ability to have days off for essential parenting activities. Tax incentives for corporations to underwrite child-care costs could be expanded at minimal cost.

Specialists in the field of early childhood advocate a federally guaranteed right to a six-month unpaid maternity leave, so that a woman does not have to choose between leaving her job or her newborn. Why not leaves of two or three years with the right to return to a similar job, as an American, family-oriented alternative to public infant day care? And it is hard to argue that disability insurance, covering pregnancy and childbirth, should not be made mandatory in the 45 states without coverage, and extended to public employees.

It is my guess that this or a similar agenda—the great unfinished business of the woman's movement—will become one of the major social and political issues of the 1980s.●

KINGSTON VFW TO HONOR ADJUTANT WILLIAM J. SMITH

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday evening, February 11, Anthracite Post 283 of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States will honor its adjutant of many years, William J. Smith, with a testimonial dinner dance.

Mr. Smith has served as adjutant and public relations officer for the Anthracite Post for nearly 20 years and served as post commander in 1962-63.

Mr. Smith has long been active in the departmental and national organizations of the VFW. He has served as national aide-de-camp, special aide-de-camp to the commander in chief and as a member of the National Public Relations and Broadcasters Committee. On the departmental level, he is presently serving on the Scotland School Committee, Life Membership Committee and the Americanism Committee.

All of us know, Mr. Speaker, the outstanding work that the Veterans of Foreign Wars has done over the years in promoting patriotism, in creating numerous educational programs for the young such as its outstanding Voice of Democracy competition and, generally, in reminding us that in Webster's words "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." We all know, as well, that a national organization is only as strong as the individuals who make up its posts. And its posts and their committees are only as strong as those few outstanding men who are willing to assume the hard work—not only the glamorous major assignments but the hard, seemingly endless day to day chores. Without such men no great organization could exist.

One such man is my friend and colleague in veteran's affairs, Bill Smith. It will be my honor, Mr. Speaker, to join his family, comrades, friends, and neighbors in paying tribute to him this Saturday evening and it is a pleasure as well to bring his outstanding efforts to the attention of my friends and colleagues here in the House.●

AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL COMPETITIVENESS

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address an issue of vital concern to our national priorities in 1984: The question of American industrial competitiveness. The challenge of greater productivity growth is of supreme importance to America's future. Americans have witnessed declines in U.S. industrial strength and must come face to face with the hard reality that something must be done about managerial techniques if our Nation is to remain a world economic leader.

From 1948 to 1968, productivity in the private economy had risen at an average rate of about 3 percent a year, providing the American people with one of the highest standards of living in the world. But after 1968, that rate began dropping. By 1979 and 1980, it had actually turned negative as inflation and interest rates soared.

From this, there is no single, all-encompassing solution for increased productivity. Japan, however, may be used as a model for American corporations to begin this task. Increasingly, since World War II, Japanese products have experienced phenomenal success in international markets. Japan's ability to supply high quality, low priced goods is founded upon the special characteristics of the Japanese people, coupled with unique Japanese management techniques. The practice of making decisions by consensus and a strong group orientation have contributed to the success of Japanese management techniques. Consequently, the combination of Japanese culture and the system of management that has been so instrumental in inducing workers to be loyal, hardworking, and proud of the quality of work life, has resulted in highly productive and competitive industries.

American corporations should follow the Japanese example and try to dissolve the traditional acrimony between labor and management. They must look at the rewards in efficiency and productivity of the cooperative relations between workers and managers in Japan. This amounts to a redefinition of self-interest by both labor and management, the belief that each side must be more flexible in dealing with the other to meet the challenge of foreign competition. This participative characteristic of management is fairly new in the United States but has a long history in Japan.

We must bring back the competitive spirit which led America to its position of leadership and which, significantly, now so dominates and propels the Japanese economy. With these thoughts in mind, I would like to insert in today's RECORD, a copy of an article from People magazine.

The article follows:

HOW HAS JAPAN OVERTAKEN AMERICA? THE FAULT, SAYS ONE EXPERT, LIES NOT IN OUR CARS, BUT IN OURSELVES

Its 119 million people are squeezed precariously onto four Pacific islands virtually devoid of natural resources. Much of its industrial base was reduced to rubble by the end of World War II. Yet in less than 40 years Japan has become the world's second greatest economic power, rivaling the United States in steel, producing an ever-increasing variety of high-quality consumer goods and even surpassing the U.S. in electronics and in auto production. In the economically troubled U.S. and Europe, angry calls for protectionist strictures have been accompanied by a sense of awe at Japan's efficiency. Still, the question remains: How much of its success is based on ingenious managerial techniques and how much on the unique Japanese character?

This question and others are addressed by Robert C. Christopher in his book The Japanese Mind: The Goliath Explained (Linden Press/Simon & Schuster, $16.95). A former editor at TIME and Newsweek, Christopher, 59, has been fascinated by Japan since his arrival there as a Japanese-language officer in the U.S. Occupation forces in September 1945. "I returned there for a second tour of Army duty in the Korean War and from the mid-1960s on have visited the country almost annually," says Christopher. Now living in Old Lyme, Conn., he is the administrator of the annual Pulitzer Prizes. With Assistant Editor Joshua Hammer, he discussed what can be borrowed from Japan—and what can't be.

Is the Japanese mind really much different from the American mind?

Absolutely. The Japanese are profoundly group-oriented. They have a far greater sense of loyalty to the institutions they serve than Americans do. In Japan, people join a company and stay all their working lives. They feel, and are made to feel, that the company's success rests squarely on their efforts. Furthermore, the notion that you can achieve success outside the group context is utterly alien to them. A middle manager for a very important corporation has far more prestige than a guy who started and runs his own small or medium-size business, even though the latter may be wealthier and more powerful. To be different is dangerous and regarded with great disfavor.

What accounts for this group mentality?

Historically, you had a large group of people occupying a number of small islands with very limited natural resources. People were forced to ban together in support groups to make sure everything was equitably distributed. The Japanese never had the opportunity to assert their individuality because the possibility just wasn't there, economically or physically.

So a shared sense of vulnerability is a key factor in the Japanese success?

Yes. Japanese labor doesn't need to be persuaded that its interests and those of the corporation are inextricably bound up with each other. If a union has to choose between wage increases and a health cash flow for the company, it will opt for the cash flow. The success of the company is seen as the key to survival.

How does management cultivate that sense of individual loyalty?

Japan's big modern companies instinctively regard themselves as being responsible for the economic and psychic well-being of their workers. They do such things as furnish housing for single employees, help married employees acquire housing, sell land to them below market prices, provide low-interest loans, educational benefits for employees' children, and all sorts of medical and recreational facilities, and sponsor group outings. In general, they play a much more active role in the whole life of the employee than American firms do.

How does management structure differ from that of U.S. corporations?

Radically. In almost all Japanese companies, no executive decision is arrived at until everyone down to middle-management level and below has been given a chance to pass on it. I had a friend who for years was the top man at a Japanese shipping line. Whenever he had an idea he wanted to effect, one of his practices was to drop down to the company cafeteria at lunchtime and float the idea very tentatively in front of people four, five or six rungs down the ladder. In due course it would come back up the ladder to him and be presented as the judgment of all the people below. And the consensus approach shows itself in union-management relations too. It's quite common for management to meet at regular intervals with union leadership. When the time comes for contract negotiations, union leaders have a very clear idea of what the company's financial resources are.

But does that "team" approach extend all the way down the ladder?

Japanese executives are not nearly as remote from people on the production line as U.S. executives are. Most of them will tell you they started out on the production line themselves—if only for a token three or four months. If a chief executive doesn't have a lunch date, it's typical for him to go to the cafeteria to see how his workers are doing. In the U.S., that would sound like a publicity gimmick. I've met many Japanese executives who have spent time in this country express astonishment at what they regard as the arrogance of the American executive.

How have the Japanese managed to surpass the U.S. in research and development?

I think the key is the difference in the nature of ownership in Japan and the U.S. A great many Japanese companies belong to loose confederations, such as Mitsui or Mitsubishi. They are controlled not by outside investors but by other firms within the same group, so their managers are answering not to a bunch of people interested solely in seeing stock prices go up but to people who want to see these companies survive long-term. They're much readier to make investments that won't pay off for years. The Nippon Electric Company, for instance, made heavy investments in the semiconductor business, but it was 13 years before they made a profit from it. No publicly owned American company would carry such a major investment for so long with no return. Any guy who tried would get his head handed to him.

Yet U.S. corporations have had the capital for such reinvestment. What have they done with it?

Some of it went for inflated wages, which I believe were not justified by any increase in productivity. A lot of it went into "agglomeration." The steel industry took capital and bought shopping centers and oil companies instead of modernizing its steel-production facilities. Then take a look at the semiconductor business. The U.S.'s initial impulse was to get cheap Third World labor to build the semiconductor chips. The Japanese made machines to produce them. That involved a costly investment initially, but those machines are far less fallible than humans. The Japanese just swept the market because of the reliability of their semiconductors.

Has American workmanship also suffered?

Partly as a result of the changing social climate, including a far greater emphasis on immediate self-gratification, the pride Americans took in their work diminished. Workers got sloppy and careless. Again, though, it comes back to management. American managers tend to treat workers as interchangeable parts. Astonishingly, a Yankelovich poll showed that American workers privately subscribe to the work ethic more strongly than the Japanese. But they don't feel they get a chance to practice it because they're not motivated by American managers.

Why not?

Lots of reasons. But the primary one is the remoteness of managers from workers. Managers increasing tend to be MBAs with no real experience making anything. They think marketing is a substitute for production. You get all these youngsters out of business school stepping into highly paid, responsible jobs. They get a sense of being in a special class, whereas in Japan the management class traditionally comes up through the ranks. Also, the starting wage for a college graduate in Japan is not much higher than for a high school grad. So you don't create those instant class distinctions.

So what can we learn from the Japanese?

There are a lot of techniques that can be adopted profitably. We could easily make constant minor improvements in our manufacturing plants. Theoretically, we should be able to make heavier investments in technology, too, though there are limitations on that because of the nature of stockholder ownership in the U.S. and the need for getting money back quickly. That's hard to change without strong management. Unfortunately, there are a number of psychological techniques we cannot adopt. As a Japanese friend once said, "There's no way you're going to get individualistic Americans to behave like group-oriented Japanese."

What about projects like the Nissan plant in Smyrna, Tenn., where American workers are being exposed to Japanese management techniques?

Until now, virtually all Japanese companies that have come to the U.S. have operated on a relatively small scale—1,000 employees or fewer. They have located themselves in Middle American communities like Smyrna, where the traditional work ethic is still very strong. I question very much, as do many Japanese, whether the whole complex of Japanese management techiques can be applied in a big American plant whose workers are heavily unionized.

For example, when Chrysler was at its nadir, it offered its workers, instead of a wage increase, a profit-sharing deal, which as it turned out would have been a lot better for them. But the minute Chrysler showed a profit, the workers repudiated the plan and were right back pounding on the door demanding parity in wages with Ford and GM. Whether Chrysler can afford that is very doubtful.

Is there any way to get American labor and management working together?

The single most important thing is for American managers to become more respectful of workers. They have to instill a sense that we're all in this together. The Yankelovich poll showed that the Japanese workers were far more convinced that the fruits of any gain in productivity would go largely to them. American workers think the fruits are going to the executives and stockholders. If that is going to change, American managers must demonstrate genuine concern, not psychological sleight of hand.●

LEAKING UNDERGROUND STORAGE LEGISLATION

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Tuesday, February 7, 1984

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, it smells like gasoline. It tastes like gasoline. It is gasoline. More and more gasoline, or similar liquids, are being found in the tapwater of American households. Ground water provides drinking water to half the American people. We all know how essential it is. yet all of us are familiar with individuals in our districts whose wells have been contaminated by gasoline.

The problem will get worse before it gets better as more and more old, buried tanks rust through and leak their contents into the ground water. What is the scope of the problem? It is estimated that 1.4 million underground tanks in the United States store gasoline. An unknown additional number of tanks store a variety of other petroleum products and other liquid hydrocarbons. Of 1.4 million underground tanks storing gasoline, approximately 85 percent are made of steel with no corrosion protection and were buried over 20 years ago. Some experts estimate that 75,000 to 100,000 of these underground gasoline tanks may currently be leaking their contents into the ground and ground water supplies, and perhaps 350,000 tanks may be leaking within the next 5 years. This is a problem of national significance.

The solution to this problem or even the beginning of a solution is not cheap. But, the earlier we start the identification and cleanup process, the cheaper it will be. The longer we wait to start, the more tanks will rust through, and the more expensive cleanup will be. Waiting is the most expensive path. Millions of people could be affected.

I have just introduced H.R. 4761, which provides for relief, cleanup, and for preventative standards to be set by EPA for existing and future buried tanks.

My bill will tackle this problem in two different ways. First, it amends the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980—Superfund—to give the EPA the authority to clean up gasoline leaks which have occurred from underground storage tanks and makes fund moneys available for these cleanup or other assistance activities.

The authority available to EPA includes the ability to take actions that are necessary to prevent, minimize, or mitigate damage to the public health or welfare or to the environment, such as provision of alternate water supplies, temporary evacuation and housing of threatened individuals. In those situations, EPA would be authorized under Superfund to spend up to $1 million for each leaking storage tank. Long-term remedies such as ground water cleanup also will be available.

The money for these cleanup activities will come from the Superfund trust fund, a $1.6 billion fund assessed through a tax on oil and chemical feedstocks. And in these cases where a responsible party can be identified, my bill gives the EPA the authority to recover cleanup costs from them. Superfund liability provisions would be available for the Agency to use against all responsible parties who have caused or contributed to these leaks.

It is my intention that the Agency use these liability provisions in an evenhanded way so that responsible parties pay their fair share for damages that has occurred.

The second approach my bill takes toward solving this problem is to require the EPA to establish general standards applicable to new and existing underground storage tanks used for commercial or governmental purposes. These standards may include a wide variety of factors addressing the location, design, construction, operation, and maintenance of the tanks as well as monitoring, testing, financial responsibility, inspection, and corrective action for such tanks. In addition, I have directed the EPA to evaluate residential tanks as well. That study is to be completed within 1 year of the date of enactment of my bill.

Another important feature of my bill is that individual permits would not necessarily be required for each tank. Rather, the EPA Administrator is given the discretion to set up a permit program where he decides one is necessary. An example of this would be where specific factors—for example soil conditions, type of tank, years in ground, moisture, and other environmental factors—should be taken into account. Otherwise the Administrator can implement the standards set forth as a result of this bill directly.

Since I believe it is important that the States be involved to the maximum extent possible in handling the regulation of these underground tanks, my bill gives EPA the authority to approve State programs to operate in lieu of the Federal program. I hope that the States will take advantage of the opportunity to establish their own programs.

The bill has several self-enforcing features which will work to help correct the situation. In addition to direct regulatory features they are: first, financial responsibility or an insurance requirement on buried gasoline or liquid hydrocarbon tanks; second, the ability of suppliers of gasoline to deny product to owner unless there is compliance with standards set by EPA as a result of this bill. There are simply too many buried tanks out there to include all of them in the Federal Agency permitting process. Some individual tanks may already be safe.

Finally, this bill provides a $60 million authorization for 3 years—1985-87—to be utilized by the State and Federal Governments in carrying out the requirements of the bill. This is a generous authorization, which should provide more than adequate funds for doing the tasks required by the bill. Lack of prompt action at this time will only further compound the problem and make eventual cleanup vastly more difficult and expensive.

In conclusion, I would like to underscore the importance of addressing this emerging national environmental problem. As part of my initiative to help solve this problem, I will be working closely with State and local officials to insure coordination with the Federal officials.

I am introducing this bill today because I believe it takes a strong, comprehensive approach to resolving this crisis. It provides for both cleanup authority for environmental contamination that has occurred; it addresses the problem of existing inground tanks; and it insures that future problems do not occur by requiring that new underground storage tanks be safe.

I believe this legislation provides a framework for a successful resolution of an urgent national problem, and I intend to press forward for its prompt enactment.

Text of the bill follows:

H.R. 4761

A bill to amend the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 (Superfund) to provide for removal, remedial action, and liability with respect to gasoline and other liquid hydrocarbons which leak from certain underground storage tanks and to establish standards to prevent releases from such tanks into the environment, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Leaking Underground Storage Tank Liability and Standards Act of 1984".

AMENDMENT OF CERCLA

SEC. 2. (a) DEFINITION OF UNDERGROUND STORAGE TANK.—Section 101 of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 is amended by striking out "and" and the end of paragraph (31), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (32) and substituting "; and" and by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(33) 'underground storage tank' means a tank which is located partially or wholly underground."

(b) DEFINITION OF HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCE.—Section 101(14) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 is amended by—

(1) striking out "and (F)" and substituting ", (F)",

(2) striking out "Control Act." and substituting "Control Act, and (G) gasoline and other liquid hydrocarbons which are stored in an underground storage tank from which there is a release or threatened release."; and

(3) by striking out "The term does not include petroleum" and substituting "Except as provided in subparagraph (G), the term does not include".

STANDARDS FOR UNDERGROUND STORAGE TANKS USED FOR STORAGE OF HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES, INCLUDING GASOLINE OR OTHER LIQUID HYDROCARBONS

SEC. 3. (a) STANDARDS.—Not later than 12 months after the enactment of this Act, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "Administrator") shall promulgate regulations establishing performance standards, applicable to owners and operators of underground storage tanks used for the storage of hazardous substances, including gasoline or other liquid hydrocarbons, in order to prevent releases into the environment for the operational life of the tank. Such regulations shall apply only to underground storage tanks which are located on property used primarily for commercial or governmental purposes. The Administrator shall, where appropriate, distinguish in such standards between requirements appropriate for new tanks and for tanks in existence on the date of promulgation of the standards. Such standards shall include, but shall not be limited to, requirements respecting—

(1) the location, design, and construction of such tanks;

(2) contingency plans for effective action to minimize releases of hazardous substances, including gasoline or other liquid hydrocarbons, from such tanks;

(3) the maintenance and operation of such tanks;

(4) financial responsibility;

(5) monitoring or testing of such tanks and the surrounding environment;

(6) corrective action in the event of a release of any hazardous substance, including gasoline or other liquid hydrocarbons, from such a tank;

(7) recordkeeping and reporting; and

(8) closure or removal of the tank at the end of its operational life.

(b) IMPLEMENTATION AND ENFORCEMENT.—The Administrator may promulgate, and make effective in accordance with section 3010 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act, regulations to implement the standards of subsection (a) or the Administrator may establish a permit program to implement such standards where he finds that such a permit program is necessary for such purposes. If the Administrator makes such a determination, any person or category of persons who stores any hazardous substance, including gasoline or any other liquid hydrocarbon, in an underground storage tank located on property used primarily for commercial or governmental purposes may be required to have a permit for such storage in order to assure compliance with such standards.

(c) APPLICATION OF SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL ACT PROVISIONS.—The provisions of section 3006 and 3007 of Subtitle C of the Solid Waste Disposal Act, the provisions of subsections (a) through (c) of section 3008 of such subtitle, the provisions of section 3009 of such subtitle, the provisions of section 3010(b) of such subtitle the provisions of section 6001 of such Act, and the provisions of subtitle G of such Act, shall apply to the program and requirements established under this section in the same manner as such provisions apply to the hazardous waste regulatory program established under subtitle C of such Act. For purposes of applying such provisions to the program and requirements established under this Act, the term "hazardous substance, including gasoline or other liquid hydrocarbons" shall be substituted for the term "hazardous waste" when used in such provisions.

(d) DEFENSE TO OTHER SUPPLY REQUIREMENTS.—If, upon the request of any person supplying any hazardous substance, including gasoline or other liquid hydrocarbons, to any underground storage tank, the owner or operator of any underground storage tank fails or refuses to provide to such supplier appropriate evidence of compliance with the stanards established under this section, such failure or refusal shall constitute a defense to any enforcement action brought under any other authority of law to require such supplier to deliver any hazardous substance, including gasoline or other liquid hydrocarbons, to such tank. For purposes of this subsection, any permit issued for a tank under this section or any other certification of compliance under this section, as determined by the Administrator, shall constitute appropriate evidence of compliance with such standards.

(e) CRIMINAL PENALTY.—Any person who knowingly commits a material violation or omission with respect to any requirement established by the Administrator under this section shall, if such violation or omission results in a release or threatened release of any hazardous substance, including gasoline or other liquid hydrocarbon, from an underground storage tank be subject to a fine of not more than $50,000 for each day of violation, or to imprisonment for not to exceed two years, or both.

(f) DEFINITIONS.—As used in this section—

(1) The term "underground storage tank" means a tank which is located wholly or partially underground.

(2) The term "hazardous substance" has the meaning provided by section 101(14) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980, as amended by section 2 of this Act.

(g) AUTHORIZATION.—There is authorized to be appropriated not more than $60,000,000 for the fiscal year period 1985 through 1987 to carry out this section. Not more than 50 per centum of the amount appropriated in any such fiscal year may be used to make grants to the States for purposes of assisting the States in the development and implementation of programs to carry out this section. Such State programs shall be carried out in the same manner as required with respect to State programs under section 3006 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act, and funds shall be allocated among the States in the same manner as provided in subsection (b) of section 3011 of that Act.

(h) RESIDENTAL UNDERGROUND STORAGE TANKS.—Not later than 1 year after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall conduct a study regarding underground storage tanks which are located on residential property and which are used for the storage of hazardous substances (including gasoline or other liquid hydrocarbons). Such study shall include estimates of the number and location of such tanks and an analysis of the extent to which there may be releases or threatened releases from such tanks into the environment. Upon completion of the study, the Administrator shall submit a report to the President and to the Congress containing the results of the study and recommendations respecting whether or not such tanks which are located on residential property should be subject to the preceding provisions of this section.●

SENATE—Wednesday, February 8, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, February 6, 1984)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable ROBERT W. KASTEN, Jr., a Senator from the State of Wisconsin.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Loving Father, we remember Senator LEAHY, his family and especially his mother, in the loss of his beloved father. Fill their hearts with Thy peace and comfort. We remember also Senator EVANS in the loss of his brother and pray Thou wilt console the family and especially the widow with Your gracious love.

Almighty God, Supreme Ruler of the Universe from whom comes all authority and all power, we pray for Thy blessing and guidance as the Senate faces these next 3 busy days. We thank Thee for our leaders, Senator BAKER, and Senator BYRD, and we ask that Thou wilt give them wisdom, strength, and patience as they steer the Senate through the work that ought to be completed before recess.

Help the Senate to avoid superfluous issues that retard rather than advance progress. Free the Senators from extraneous matters that interrupt and force them to digress from essential activities. Free them from anxiety and discouragement and help their hearts and minds to be open to divine direction.

We thank Thee Lord for hard working staffs whose tireless labors behind the scenes support the Senators in getting the job done. Bless them in their commitment and faithfulness. We ask this in the name of Him who finished the work He came to Earth to do. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., February 8, 1984.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable ROBERT W. KASTEN, Jr., a Senator from the State of Wisconsin, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. KASTEN thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY TO SENATORS LEAHY AND EVANS AND THEIR FAMILIES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I wish to join with I am sure every Member of the Senate and our distinguished Chaplain in extending our sympathies to Senator LEAHY and his family on the passing of his father, and Senator EVANS and his family on the passing of his brother.

I have often said, Mr. President, that the Senate in many ways is a family and more tightly knit than many people realize. We live together daily. We interact as a relatively small group. We deal with difficult issues. We must contain our concerns and anger so that the Senate does the people's business.

So, Mr. President, when one of us suffers a loss or a grave illness or other anguish and pain, it gives us all more pain than might otherwise be suspected. I know these things firsthand, Mr. President, because I have experienced loss and grief from the loss of family members in two cases, losses of members of this kind, one in the Senate and one in the House. So I share with Senator LEAHY and Senator EVANS a personal understanding of the grief that they are experiencing and I extend to them a special understanding that this Senate family can offer.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on today, there will be special orders in favor of three Senators after the leader time has been claimed or yielded back. The special orders are, as usual, for not more than 15 minutes in length. Authority was granted on yesterday for the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee, Mr. SASSER, to utilize 15 minutes of special time in favor of the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD.

After the execution of the special orders, Mr. President, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to go not past the hour of 12:30 p.m., in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

After the period for morning business has expired or has been closed, the Senate will resume consideration of the unfinished business, which is S. 1765, the death penalty bill. A cloture motion has been filed against further debate on the bill itself.

I urge Senators who may have amendments to that bill to come to the floor and offer them today. We should not simply stand by and wait for the cloture vote, because if cloture is invoked—and I very much hope that it will be—then only amendments that qualify under the rules will be eligible. So I urge Senators to use today to offer their amendments. I do expect rollcall votes today.

If we have a break in the course of the day in the debate on the death penalty bill or amendments to it, the leadership on this side will consult with the leadership on the other side with the view to try to find something else worthwhile for the Senate to do. One bill that might be taken up today, if the opportunity presents itself, is the career criminal bill. It would require unanimous consent to do that, but it is a good time to do that if there is a break in the proceedings. I would urge those who are interested in that measure to consider whether we might set aside 30 minutes or 1 hour to do that bill during the course of the day.

Mr. President, we will be in session today as long as necessary to accommodate the needs of Senators, perhaps beyond the usual recess hour of 6 o'clock. But I do expect it to be a full day, and, once again, I do expect rollcall votes today.

Mr. President, we are still negotiating on a time that might be established by unanimous consent for the cloture vote to occur tomorrow. If we do not succeed with that, the cloture vote will occur 1 hour after the Senate convenes. But I would like to make it later than that if possible in order to comply with the wishes of the Senator from Michigan and perhaps other Senators as well. I will try to have a further announcement on that and perhaps a unanimous-consent request to make later in the day.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time allocated to the distinguished minority leader under the standing order may be reserved for his use at any time during this day.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER) is here. He has the first special order. We have already provided for leader time to be reserved. I now yield back my time with the hope that the Chair may recognize Senator DURENBERGER to proceed under the special order.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR DURENBERGER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Minnesota is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

GEORGE THISS

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I join the Chaplain this morning and the majority leader in sharing with our colleagues, PAT LEAHY and DAN EVANS, the grief that they feel in the loss of a loved one.

On December 2, 1983, in the middle of the recess period, I lost a very good friend and the State of Minnesota lost an outstanding public servant. George Thiss, who was my chief of staff, died of a heart attack, very suddenly.

George was the kind of person who is impossible to describe to those who did not know him. You can list all his accomplishments, his many contributions to a variety of public and private organizations and the tributes he earned in his community, but all of that only tells you a little bit about who George Thiss really was.

Above all, he was a person who cared for other people. He always saw the good in everyone. He was always there to help a person, not just with his time but with his ideas, his concern and his love.

He was a devoted husband and an ideal father. Anyone who saw George relate to his two sons, Chuck and Mark, walked away with a deep understanding and appreciation of what parenting means.

I cannot tell you how much I miss George. But I also cannot tell you how happy I am that I had the opportunity in my lifetime to know a person like George Thiss and to work closely with him on projects that meant a great deal to both of us.

Throughout his lifetime George shared everything he had with everyone he touched. One of the many things that struck me was that everyone who remembered George remembered a different quality—he had touched everyone, each in a different way.

Mr. President, I would like to share the memories of George with my colleagues and ask unanimous consent that articles from the December 3 Minneapolis Star and Tribune and the December 3 St. Paul Pioneer Press, along with the memorial to George Thiss, be included in today's RECORD.

There being no objection, the materials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORIAL SERVICE FOR GEORGE RAYMOND THISS

Many commentators and writers today express deep concern over the terrific pace at which our world and society seem to be moving. Events come and pass by so quickly. There is hardly time for any thinking. So many important matters of life are taken for granted and pushed aside. Then suddenly the inevitable realities of life spring forth and cause us to stop for a moment and ponder about our existence, our very nature, our Creator.

Death is one of the realities of life we tend to forget. It is something we all know we must one day face. We push it aside though and try to forget it. But the truth of the end of this physical life keeps coming forth again and again in an attempt to remind us of the importance of what we do with the days we have.

Our period of life is comparatively short when seen in the perspective of the hundreds of thousands of years of history behind us and the hundreds of thousands of years that stretch ahead. Yet these years are vital and important years for each of us. They are our years. They belong to no one else. In these years there are decisions we must make and these decisions determine our present and our future, our day to day existence and our destiny.

We do not know how or when life on this earth will cease to exist for any of us. But we know that death comes to all people. We do not know exactly what lies beyond the grave. Death's door is really a large question mark in many ways. Still for the Christian this does not present a problem. The Bible does not specifically define what eternity will be in terms of material things. Yet the Holy Scripture gives us all the information we need. For we are told that God has prepared a place for those who have faith and trust in Him.

God Almighty though is a reality of life we sometimes take for granted. Yet he is always there when we need him. Not only at the moment of death, but in every moment of life. Jesus said, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." What a comfort and strength the fact of Christ's presence with us can be in time of sorrow and special need. Yet the real joy comes for the Christian in knowing that the Lord is present in every moment of life.

A loved one, a dear friend has died. We gather here tonight not only to mourn the loss, but also to celebrate the life, to share the experience and rejoice in the memories that each of you have of your relationship with George Thiss. I cannot share those with you. I did not have the privilege of knowing George. But I do know and have talked with the people who were most close with him and they have shared with me the most important things about their loved one. With their permission, I share some of them with you.

"My Dad cared about people. He treated people like real persons. He tried always to see the good side of people. He didn't dwell on the bad things. He tried to do a good job in everything he did. He helped us with our homework so that we could learn. He made us go to bed so we could get our rest. He spent time with us and did important things with us, things that were important to us, like playing catch, and going to games and coming to watch us play. He didn't want to move away because then he wouldn't have as much time for us. He kept his word. When he said he would do something you could depend upon it. He would do it. Maybe it would have to be later, but he would do it. He was a caring person, but he cared for us first."

As a result of these words from Chuck and Mark about their Dad, I chose the passage from St. Paul's letter to the Philippians to read today. I read it again, because I think St. Paul's directive was one that George Thiss followed. "Whatever is true, whatever is honorable, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is gracious, if there is any excellence, if there is anything worthy of praise, think about these things."

George not only thought about that, he followed it as well and acted upon those words and ideas. We live in a day and age where there is much spoken of and written about parenting. One of our problems is that there is far more talk than action. It is evident to me from the life and character of his sons that George was a father who put parenting into action, not just in his relationship with his sons, not just in the time he spent with them, but also in the example he set for them. He not only cared for them. He showed them how important it is in life to care for other people also.

Each of you here this evening has had your life touched in some way by the caring nature of George Thiss. He has shared life experiences with you. George is no longer here with us. His journey on this earth has ended. Although that saddens his sons and they will miss him they are not concerned about him. Again I quote from them.

"Dad is in good hands. God is taking care of him. Self pity won't do any good, besides, Dad wouldn't want that. We know he had heart problems. I am glad he died quickly. It would have been hard on him to have to be down in bed and be sick or not be able to be up and around and doing things with us. A long illness would have been rough on him. I am so glad he did not have to go through that. He is in heaven now and we don't have to worry about him."

The boys speak the truth. We do not have to worry about George. And from what I have been able to learn about George, he would not want you to be sad and mourn about him. However, for many of you the question runs through your mind. What can we do? What can we do to honor George? There are some ways in which you can remember and honor George. Follow his example in your own life. Are there ways in which you can be a more caring person? Are there people around you who need the concern that you could offer. Are there children, young people in your life who could use some real, genuine parenting, are there people who depend upon you, who have gotten to the point that they feel they really can't, that your word does not really mean much anymore.

The boys are correct. George is in good hands. The God who created us and cared for us in this life has received George into his care. However, there are people whose lives were touched and cared for by George, that won't have him around. Maybe you know them, maybe you are one of them. You have an opportunity to pick up where George left off and fill the void that is left by his departure.

The days ahead will be lonely for you the family and you the friends. Our God, however, did not create us and then just leave us. He promises that his presence is with us each and every day if only we will reach out to him and seek and accept his love and his comfort and his guidance. The presence of the living God is with you each of the days to come, to strengthen you to be a more caring person with His help.

HEART ATTACK KILLS GEORGE THISS, 55, DURENBERGER AIDE

(By Jim Dawson and Steve Berg)

George R. Thiss, chief of staff to Sen. Dave Durenberger and former chairman of Minnesota's Independent-Republican Party, died of a heart attack early Friday.

Thiss, 55, was stricken in his Edina home about 8 p.m. Thursday after returning from work in Minneapolis. He was taken to Fairview Southdale Hospital where he died at 2:15 a.m. yesterday. Durenberger's administrative assistant said in Washington, D.C., that Thiss had not felt well earlier in the week, thought he had flu and visited his doctor. He also said Thiss had had some heart problems in the past few years.

"You fetch around for what made him different and everybody's friend," Durenberger said. "He always saw the good in people and saw the opportunity in a situation instead of looking on the dark side."

Durenberger said his Minneapolis office would be closed Monday in Thiss' memory.

Thiss joined Durenberger's staff in 1979, after serving for eight years as the executive director of the Upper Midwest Council. The council is a Minneapolis-based research group that conducts conferences and studies on regional economic issues.

He was state chairman of the Minnesota Independent-Republican Party from 1965 to 1971, the longest anyone has held that position. He left the position a year after the DFL Party captured the state Legislature, saying politics had "lost its fun."

"George was exceptional, a fine person," said Douglas Head, a Minneapolis attorney and former IR attorney general.

"He cared for people and he liked to be involved in government and public service," Head said. "His forte was organization and getting it done. He was an exceptionally fine planner."

Head also said Thiss had taken personally the IR defeat in 1971.

Thiss was widely known as a moderate who was skilled at bringing people of differing viewpoints together.

"He was one of the most successful chairmen the party ever had," said Lois West, communications director for the IR party. She said she once asked Thiss how he was able to get people to compromise on emotionally charged issues and he responded: "I just put myself in a mixture of their shoes and our shoes and we are able to come up with some ideas."

Thiss also served on the board of directors of the Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs. Harlan Cleveland, director of the institute said Friday that Thiss "was one of the Humphrey institute's strongest supporters and advocates from the very outset."

When Thiss re-entered politics in early 1979 as chief of staff for Durenberger, he said he planned to conduct the job from Durenberger's Minneapolis office.

"I wouldn't have taken this job if it meant going to Washington and getting involved in the scene 24 hours a day," he said in a 1978 interview. "You know, I got married kind of late (when he was 39), and we have two kids. . . . It's too much fun being with them to give that up and be going to a political meeting every night like I used to do when I was party chairman."

Thiss is survived by his wife, Joyce, and two sons, Mark, 14, and Chuck, 10.

The memorial service is scheduled for 7:30 p.m. Sunday at Normandale Lutheran Church in Edina. A private burial service will be held Monday.

Thiss's family requested that the memorial gifts go to the Humphrey institute.

I-R'S GEORGE THISS DIES OF HEART ATTACK

(By Aron Kahn)

Former State Republican Party Chairman George Thiss, who died early Friday, was responsible for much of the political success of U.S. Sen. David Durenberger, the senator said.

"From my first day in politics, George Thiss was the kind of public servant I wanted to be," Durenberger said following Thiss' fatal heart attack. "Whatever successes I enjoy as a U.S. senator are due in large part to lessons he taught me, the guidance he gave me and the friendship he shared with me."

Thiss, who was Durenberger's chief aide, died at 2:15 a.m. in Fairview-Southdale Hospital after suffering a heart attack at about 8 p.m. Thursday in his Edina home. He was 55.

Durenberger said Thiss was examined Tuesday after complaining of not feeling well.

Thiss served as state GOP chairman from 1965 to 1971, when he became director of the Upper Midwest Council, a public policy research organization. He became chief aide to Durenberger in 1978, and held that position at the time of his death.

"George knew and understood politics in the best sense of the word," Durenberger said. "He was brilliant at dealing with sensitive and difficult issues . . . He had a unique ability to bring people together, overcoming their differing points of view and focusing on their agreements."

Lois West, a spokeswoman for the Independent-Republican Party, said Thiss "was unusual in the political arena in that he never sought power and wasn't interested in public office. But he cared passionately about public policy, about bringing together the best minds and the best ideas to find the most workable solution."

A Minneapolis native, Thiss held degrees from the University of Minnesota and New York University. Before becoming state party chairman, he worked for his father's luggage firm and for Breck School.

Thiss began working on Republican campaigns in 1952 and in 1961 was named the state's outstanding Young Republican.

For the past three years, he was a member of the advisory committee to the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Minnesota. Memorials to the institute are preferred.

Thiss is survived by his wife, Joyce, and sons, Mark and Chuck, all of Edina.

A memorial service will be at 7:30 p.m. Sunday in Normandale Lutheran Church, 6100 Normandale Road, Edina, with a private burial in Lakewood Cemetery.

Durenberger's Minneapolis office will be closed Monday.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

LENDING, SPENDING, AND BORROWING

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, let me deal as briefly as I can in the time permitted me with one of the overriding quesions that faces the people of this country in 1984, which, we all know, is a Presidential, senatorial, and congressional election year. That is, how is it that we who have been charged with the responsibility of governance in America can return to the public in an election year with a $6.1 trillion national debt overhanging the future of that public, with a $170 to $180 to $200 billion annual deficit accumulation as far as the eye can see overhanging that same public.

By way of summarizing my thoughts on the subject and by way of a response to the constituents that I represent who will not have an opportunity to take me on on this issue at the polls this November, I wish to go back and, in four segments, address the subject of the questions that I am being asked about the deficit. I shall start with a little speech that I made on November 18, 1981, to the Public Affairs Council. I shall, after quoting briefly from it, ask unanimous consent that the entire speech be printed in the RECORD.

November 1981 was an interesting time for all of us, because we had just finished in the Congress doing everything we thought the American public elected us to do. We had cut spending, we had cut taxes, and nothing was happening. Interest rates were still high, inflation was still high, Wall Street was not altering its performance. We stood around in the fall of that year wondering why, having done all that—spending cuts and tax reform and so forth—the public was not responding. I tried to summarize my concern in this particular speech by covering some of the things that that conference was called to cover in Washington, D.C.—balancing the budget, tax cut, regulatory reform, New Federalism, private sector initiatives, corporate responsibility—all of that sort of thing. It was my job at the end of that conference to summarize what was then a very popular word in the discussion of these subjects—the word was "Reaganomics"—and to put all the themes of that conference into the context of spending cuts and taxes and then, as you recall, Mr. President, balancing the budget by November of 1983.

I took the opportunity to say that if I were President at that time, I think it would be most appropriate to give the Nation a positive vision of the Federal Government and its role in our society. I went on to say that only by following a compass that is pointed somewhere can we get somewhere. I said that the national agenda at that time had been shaped in reaction to the accumulated errors of a political epoch, and that will not do any more; what we need is a positive theory of government, a precise blueprint for Federal policy and purpose. The President, whoever he is, has to touch on each of those themes that people had been considering at this particular conference.

I started by taking on the theme of lending, spending, and borrowing. We in the political system accuse everybody else on the other side of the aisle of being the spenders, the lenders, the taxers, the big borrowers. I said what in the world does the abstraction of the Federal Government represent? Why do we have this fixation about debt and deficit? Why should we care whether the budget is balanced or not?

I said I did not find the answers to those questions by looking at Wall Street, as Dave Stockman has always believed—because balancing the budget is not a checkbook operation. It is not a matter of finding out how much you spent today and how much you had coming in today. In the 1980's, balancing the budget is an issue of trust. It is trust between every politician and his or her constituents—trust between me and my fellow Minnesotans. Trust between Federal Government and State and local government. And trust part of the individual and his or her private deeds and interests. The desire to balance the budget is the desire to change the role of Government in our society. We have not done that yet. And until we do, public tolerance of Government and its officials will not improve.

There are no easy budget tricks that can redefine the Federal purpose. That is the lesson we have forgotten in Dave Stockman's education as recounted by the Atlantic Monthly. Waste, fraud, and abuse, porkbarrel, boondoggle, handouts—cut every nickel and you cannot solve the budget problem. In fact, it is not a budget problem at all. It is a policy problem that cuts across every aspect of government. Consider the four basic components on the spending side of the Federal budget—entitlements, interest payments, defense spending, and discretionary social programs.

I said, back in 1981, as the first Republican Senator up in a Democratic State for reelection in 30 years:

Let me go back to the entitlements and be perfectly blunt about our dilemma. We cannot balance the budget without changing entitlements policy. It's more than Social Security. It's more than whole range of government commitments to the safety net theory of the federal role.

Changing entitlements policy is a necessary long and arduous political process. And truly, the Democrats would like nothing better than to see us try. Because the Republican Party is losing the confidence of the American people on the subject of income security. Even if the Democrats could propose fiscally sound reform—and the polls of that party are not interested in fiscally sound reform—the public would rather trust the political agenda to them, to the Democrats, if the social safety net is at the top of the list.

We have some politicians on our side of the aisle, as well. One or two. They can read public polls and they have scurried to the refuge of a bipartisan commission on Social Security to hide from the issue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of that speech be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY SENATOR DAVE DURENBERGER TO THE PUBLIC AFFAIRS COUNCIL

Over the last day and one half, you have most probably heard several consistent themes in your seminar on Reaganomics. Balancing the budget, the tax cut, regulatory reform, the new federalism, private sector initiatives, corporate responsibility. In my role as your final speaker, I have the opportunity to paint a summary of Reaganomics and to put these themes into a framework that has a message. It's an opportunity that I am honored to have and one that I've looked forward to for several weeks.

My President would want me to say that we have made a new beginning—that his promise in the 1980 campaign has been fulfilled. But at the close of this first year as I look back over the last eleven months, that isn't my overwhelming impression.

If I had to choose one phrase to describe the 1st session of the 97th Congress, it would be "cut, cap and block." The strategy was to reduce the increase—to achieve a stalemate with the thousands of overextended, good intentions of the last decade. Accomplishing even a draw with the forces that were marching toward national bankruptcy is success by the yardstick of the past Congresses. But measured against the promise and opportunity of a new age, we have only made small steps toward a new beginning.

The President now has two months to reflect on the State of the Union before we plunge into battle, again. I have been giving some thought to the speech he will give in January and it's my intention to share those thoughts with you, today. It's not a short speech and it's not light-hearted. It's more like work, so get comfortable, and I will expose the brutal, facts of life facing a first-term Republican up for re-election.

In January, I want the President to give the nation a positive vision of the federal government and its role in our society. Only by following a compass that is pointed somewhere, can we get somewhere. The agenda has been shaped in reaction to the accumulated errors of a political epoch. That won't do anymore. What we need is a positive theory of government, a precise blueprint for federal policy and purpose.

He has to touch on each of the themes that you have been considering at this conference. So let's begin where every discussion in Washington begins these days, with the budget problems of the national government.

SPENDING, LENDING AND BORROWING

What does the abstraction of the federal budget represent? And why should we care if it's balanced? I don't find the answers to those questions by looking at Wall Street as Dave Stockman has always believed. Balancing the budget has become an issue of trust. Trust between every politician and his or her constituents—trust between me and my fellow Minnesotans. Trust between federal government and state and local government. And trust on the part of the individual and his or her private deeds and interests. The desire to balance the budget is the desire to change the role of government in our society. We haven't done that yet. And until we do, pubic tolerance of government and its officials will not improve.

There are no easy budget tricks that can redefine the federal purpose. That is the lesson in Dave Stockman's education as recounted by the Atlantic Monthly. Waste, fraud and abuse, porkbarrel, boondoggle, handouts—cut every nickel and you can't solve the budget problem. In fact, it's not a budget problem at all. It's a policy problem that cuts across every aspect of government. Consider the four basic components on the spending side of the federal budget—entitlements, interest payments, defense spending, and discretionary social programs.

Entitlements.—Social Security, railroad retirement, Medicare, Medicaid, food stamps, veterans' pensions, civil service retirement. An inflation indexed system of cash payments with the ratio of those who are entitled to those who are paying—growing every year. Entitlement programs are not only uncontrollable in a budgetary sense, they have become untouchable as a political reality.

Interest payments.—Do you know that interest payments on the national debt are now one-seventh of the federal budget? One hundred billion dollars per year of interest on a one trillion dollar debt. Look at the second hand on your watch. A trillion seconds takes you back to the year 31,000 B.C. Before the last Ice Age. Just the interest on that debt at a dollar a second has you in the Ark with Noah. The combination of entitlements and interest payments now makes up 57% of the federal budget.

Defense spending.—To keep it afloat in a sea of red ink, we have copied the trick from entitlements and inflation-proofed our national security policy, as well. We have made a commitment to 7% real growth—7% above the inflation rate for the foreseeable future—in the 28% of our budget that is defense spending.

Discretionary social programs.—Partly federal operations, partly grants to state and local governments. Highways, sewage treatment plants, national parks, elementary and secondary education. Amtrak, UDAG, EDA, CETA, general revenue sharing. 15% of the federal budget. The smallest piece of the budget pie and the only one not indexed by law or policy. Across-the-board cuts . . . 12% piled on 12% piled on 12% cuts . . . in discretionary spending will never solve the budget problem. Won't come close. The fight that we are about to have on a Presidential veto of the continuing appropriation is an exercise in futility viewed from the larger perspective.

Let me go back to entitlements and be perfectly blunt about our dilemma. We cannot balance the budget without changing entitlements policy. It's more than Social Security. It's that whole range of government commitments to the safety net theory of the federal role.

Changing entitlements policy is a necessarily long and arduous political process. And truly, the Democrats would like nothing better than to see us try. Because the Republican Party is losing the confidence of the American people on the subject of income security. Even if the Democrats could propose fiscally sound reform—and the polls of that party are not interested in fiscally sound reform—the public would rather trust the political agenda to them, to the Democrats, if the social safety net is at the top of the list.

We have some politicians on our side of the aisle, as well. One or two. They can read public opinion polls and they have scurried to the refuge of a bipartisan commission on Social Security to hide from the issue in 1982. That's a dilemma that cannot be solved in a budgetary framework. For me it's a question of my constituents' political trust on the one hand and their income security on the other. And the great frustration is that the process won't let me use their trust to preserve their security. I say now to my President we must risk our electoral victory to save our promise.

It is time to realize that budget gimmicks cannot solve the budget problem. It is time for the defense and foreign policy establishment to remember that negotiated arms reduction can also contribute to our national security. It is time for those who are entitled to recognize that income security cannot be achieved by ignoring the aging of our population. And it is time for all of us to recall this fact of life: when our principle currency is promissory notes, everything of value will be beyond our reach.

That's what I want the President to say about the budget in January.

TAXATION

There are those, of course, who will recommend that the President balance the budget by undoing the tax cut. In a purely accounting sense, we had accomplished a rough balance between spending and revenues when the reconciliation act passed in July. We had achieved a balanced budget in July.

But having balanced the budget, we turned right around and unbalanced it by passing the largest tax cut in the nation's history. By early October—before most of the provisions had even become effective—momentum was moving in the other direction. All sorts of new tax increases—now known as revenue enhancers—were being proposed. When a tax increase is called an enhancement, you know that Congress is at work. Will Rogers once said something like, "Taxation without representation seems intolerable, until you've seen it with representation."

I keep thinking that it is only on the revenue side of the budget that we have made a new beginning. We have a policy. If we give up any basic commitments in the tax package, we may lose our best opportunity to change the role of the federal government.

So let's assume that we intend to live with the new vision of the tax code for awhile. It seems to me that a fundamental question will soon be asked. By 1983 we will pass the point where the value of tax expenditures—deductions and credits and write-offs of one kind or another—exceeds the value of bottom line liability. More revenue will be going through the loop holes than will be coming through the door of the Treasury. We have already passed that point with the corporate income tax. We have taken it out of the category of revenue raiser and put it over on the regulatory side of federal activity.

Do we want a corporate income tax that collects small amounts of revenue but functions as a significant regulator of investment through the Internal Revenue Code? Most people in this room will nod their heads to an assertion that the federal government is a lousy allocator of resources. But few of you judge your latest tax break by that standard.

At some point we will have extended so many helping hands to so many worthy interests in such a generous way through the tax code, that the general interest would be better served by scrubbing the books clean. That is an issue that I would like the President to address in his speech next January.

REGULATION

In the United States, we tolerate regulation by a government bureau in four cases . . . to protect consumers from the excesses of monopoly . . . to limit market externalities . . . to compensate for imperfect or incomplete information in a market relationship . . . to guarantee equal opportunity.

Historically, regulation took the form of limitation—control prices, restrict access to markets, prohibit products or practices—in response to the reality of monopoly providers. The industries subject to this type of regulation became very comfortable with the arrangement. The stable environment provided by regulation became preferred to the uncertainty of competition. We have only belatedly realized that as our economy grew and changed, competition forced its way into these industries. Through deregulation of airlines, trucking, banking, rail freight and perhaps communication, we are recognizing that the consumer will be better served by competition than by regulation.

Catalytic converters, scrubbers, vapor recovery, sewage treatment, hazardous waste. The theory behind this type of regulation is surprisingly audacious. It suggests that whenever a net social benefit can be gained for society through regulatory intervention, a regulatory program ought to be imposed. So long as the cost/benefit ratio is positive on the benefit side, we act. That's the theory. And we do so without regard to the cumulative cost of all the regulations built up through this calculus made one regulation at a time.

For most technology forcing regulations that's a silly calculus. The costs are all borne in the first year and the benefits are spread out over the 30 or 40 year life of the investment.

What is the general interest? It is the checkbook interest. How much regulatory benefit can we afford each year without halting the forces of economic growth? We cannot, as the theory insists, afford to buy every benefit in sight . . . every year. How do we get a checkbook—a benefits plan—that tells us how much we can afford?

There is a concept floating around called regulatory budget—another one of those bad names for a good idea—that promises an answer to these questions. Let's call it benefits planning.

The first principle is that we want as much benefit as we can afford. We'll accept the theory to that extent. And we'll also accept the cost/benefit analysis of individual regulations as a building block in the process. But we'll build with them. We will construct a summary of all the costs of all the regulations on the books. All the costs. And we will project those costs out over the next five or six years and break them down industry by industry to see who is carrying the burden.

And then we'll ask ourselves, can we afford it? Can this industry finance that regulatory requirement without losing productivity to the point where benefits really aren't exceeding social costs? If the answer is no, we will use the benefits plan to shift the load around a bit. Stretch it out where it's necessary. Move priorities to another program, if more benefit can be obtained.

You won't believe this, but some folks around here are actually moving on this idea. The Japanese have been doing it for 30 years. And I want the President to tell the whole country about it next January. It is, after all, a new beginning.

FEDERALISM

In its first months every new administration invents a theory of federalism to reflect its philosophy in domestic policy. We've had dual federalism, cooperative federalism, creative federalism, new federalism, layer-cake federalism, marble-cake federalism, fruit cake federalism. Today, we have the worst of all federalisms—budget federalism.

This federalism combines the worst principles from three federalisms of different periods. The "Big Daddy" federalism of the Great Society. The "Dump and Run" federalism invented in our year of cut, cap and block. And a "Beggar Thy Neighbor" federalism based on principles of states' rights not credible since the Articles of Confederation.

The intergovernmental partnership built in the Great Society is primarily an $85 billion pipeline of federal grants-in-aid to state and local governments. That $85 billion accounts for one-third of the resources spent by governors and mayors and county commissioners to deliver services at the state and local level. As you will recall, it is one-half of the 15% of the federal budget labeled discretionary social programs.

Discretion in this context has a hollow right to a governor or a mayor. The $85 billion is delivered through 500 separate grant programs the vast majority of which are narrow purpose categorical instruments awarded at the discretion of federal bureaucrats—with no discretion for the elected official in the statehouse or the courthouse.

In addition to the fragmentation, state and local governments find thousands of mandates—regulatory requirements attached to specific grants—and three score general requirements that apply to all recipients of federal aid. These general requirements include handicap access, equal employment opportunity, Davis-Bacon, the National Environmental Policy Act, and the many circulars of OMB.

Great Society federalism wastes national resources, distorts local priorities, and betrays the principle of accountability at every level in our political system. It has for a decade prompted the complaint that state or local governments are no more than administrative provinces directed from the agencies in Washington.

The newest federalism is a promise by the President that says, "We will return significant responsibilities to state and local government and the resources to pay for them." The instrument of this federalism is the block grant.

We authorized nine block grants to consolidate 57 specific categoricals in the Reconciliation Act this July. They were proposed on the theory that we could cut back funding by 25%, if we cut back the mandates by 100%. But Congress left many regulations intact and ear-marked funds within many of the blocks for specific categorical purposes.

And even though we authorized these new blocks in the reconciliation process, we have not appropriated the money, as yet. The President has proposed a further 12% across-the-board reduction in funding. The governors and mayors are five months into their fiscal year and they don't even know how much money they will have to spend, as yet.

The promise of a new federalism is quickly becoming no more than a constant hammering on the $85 billion pipeline of intergovernmental grants to sweat out a much larger deficit in the federal budget. We are on the brink of discrediting the President's promise, by making life unbearable for state and local officials.

Some states would do very well under the "Dump and Run" theory of federalism. They are largely exporting the costs of general government to citizens in other states through taxes on energy resources. Large cuts in federal grants are easy for North Dakota to absorb, they simply increase their tax on Minnesotans by boosting the severance tax on oil and gas. Seven states now export more than 20% of their state budgets through energy taxes.

The senior policy advisor at the White House told me this was primarily an issues of states' rights. Baloney. What rights do you have when the legislator proposing an increase in your taxes is running for office in another state. Taxation without representation is intolerable.

Maybe we can find time to concentrate on some worse problems in the federal structure of our government. There is one that deserves the President's immediate attention. You may hear it called the infrastructure problem.

Business Week recently described it as a significant threat to the hoped for economic recovery of the 1980s. I have been describing it as a problem of fiscal disparities in the hearings of my Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations.

In large part Great Society federalism—the pipeline of intergovernmental grants—has been used to fill a gap between the political and fiscal structure of state and local government and the economic structure of our society.

When the explosion in grant programs began, states and cities and counties simply did not have the capacity to respond to the challenge presented by the boom of post war growth. By capacity, I do not mean, as the special interests sometimes imply, that state and local government was dominated by mean spirited, country bumpkins who couldn't recognize the call of a new age. I mean that their fiscal instruments, primarily property and excise taxes, couldn't tap the new wealth reflected in rapidly rising incomes and that the political structure of local government did not allow for rational growth in most metropolitan communities.

There have been many changes in state and local government capacity over the past 20 years. But there is one aspect of the capacity problem that we have not solved and we continue to pay for the future everyday. We have not matched the boundaries of local government with the boundaries of local economic systems. States, especially in the Northeast and Midwest, have refused to let central cities grow to their economic horizons or to use fiscal instruments that can capture the wealth created by the services they provide.

A large part of the infrastructure problem that you will hear described is created by wealth chasing lower tax rates to the periphery of our metropolitan economic systems. Your companies do it all the time. It's a continuing transformation of the economic landscape. It causes disinvestment in the built-up infrastructure of the central city and at the same time created demand for new infrastructure investments in the outlying suburbs.

There are many political and fiscal mechanisms that could be used to attack this problem. All of them are in the hands of state legislators. So why do I recommend the issue to the President's attention? Because, with him, I dream of a government that accomplishes more of its purposes closer to the people. With his leadership we might make a new beginning on that dream by telling the states that it is time to cut the cities free and let them be integrated units of economic and political life.

PLURALISM

Federalism is an important theme in redefining the role of the national government. But lately, I find it a less useful tool than it has been in the past. Federalism focuses on the structure of government. But the scope of our discussion has reached far beyond the single-minded concentration on government in recent weeks. We have an old word in the American lexicon, pluralism, that may be more descriptive of our concerns. Somehow the "new pluralism" sounds more authentic in the world of Reaganomics.

We have four basic institutions in our society. The family . . . the business firm . . . our religious and voluntary associations . . . and the government. History has considered us a great society because we have all four and because we value and preserve each in its purpose.

There are many factors that contribute to the success of a great nation. There are natural resources. There is geography. And there are men and women of intellect and hope who devote their lives to the public good. We are a blessed nation in all of these ways. But I dare say that the genius of America is to be found in the love of our families, in the prosperity of our businesses, in the values of our voluntary associations, and in the form and openness of our government. It is to those roots that we should always return when it seems that we have lost our way. It is in understanding the distinct role of each of these four institutions that our strength is to be found.

The family must always be the fundamental institution of our society. The family gives life. The family carries our language, our customs and our values into our future—to our next generation. The family is the basic provider of human needs and would provide them, even if all of our other institutions didn't exist. The business . . . the voluntary association . . . the government, all have their beginnings in the family. What you do to preserve the family, you do for all of our society.

The business firm gets a little less respect. We are ambivalent about its role. Social philosophies find it hard to believe that greed unchecked can accomplish so much good. But we also recognize that there wouldn't be so much to have, if our economy were organized on any principle other than markets.

The religious and voluntary associations open our society to the possibilities of tomorrow. They, not government, are the guardians of our freedoms. Our churches and labor unions, service organizations and non-profit agencies, political parties and trade associations, charities and single issue groups . . . produce human services, preserve our cultural heritage, direct the energy of our volunteers, and teach the values that foster a stable democracy.

In a society organized like ours, government has taken too broad a role and in the process, we are losing sight of the purposes and functions of those other institutions—the family—the business—the voluntary association.

So let's not forget the basic purposes of government. For business we defend the shores, maintain order, and, I want to say, preserve the value of the currency. For the family we provide protection against the misfortunes of our economic system. From the fruits of profit and income, we take the resources necessary to provide every citizen with the dignity, the security and the opportunities that are the measure of a great nation. For the voluntary association, government's basic guarantees are the right to assemble, the right to speak, and the right to advocate change. Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

All would agree that we have reached well beyond that charter. As we look for a new definition of federal purpose and policy, it is time to consider the condition of those other institutions. Do they have the strength to fulfill their roles? Can we achieve a balance in government by restoring the balance in society among these institutions? Is a new social contract for these other institutions also past due?

CORPORATE RESPONSIBILITY

As a final theme this morning, let's look at one institution—the business firm—and see how Reaganomics affects the answers to these questions.

Corporate social responsibility. It's a subject with which you are all familiar. There are two views. One is a simple view "The business of business is business." Or something to that effect. I take it that view is not widely represented in this audience.

The second theory takes the big question of responsibility and divides into a lot of smaller responsibilities—responsibility to the customer—responsibility to the employee—responsibility to the community—responsibility to society. Take those challenges one at a time, not necessarily in that order, and match them with the reality of Reaganomics.

Community responsibility. Philanthrophy and citizenship. Have you noticed that there is not a lot of "gap" talk going around? The ink wasn't dry on the tax bill authorizing above the line charitable deductions, before independent sector was announcing that the Economic Recovery Tax Act would create a gap in giving. And the immediate rejoinder from a hundred corporate CEOs was to the effect that they should not be expected to fill the "gap."

Well, you can tell the CEO that we did not create a gap. What we have done is stop the galloping growth in public programs that threatened to bankrupt the nation. The target was only to reduce the increase. By doing so, we have narrowed the gap between what is needed—what is needed—this year and what double digit inflation would require for those same services needed next year.

But don't tell your CEO to relax. Measured by any standard other than the fictitious gap, corporate philanthropy—on the whole—is no cause for congratulations.

Let me read you a quote from one of your own, Ken Dayton, on the subject of corporate giving.

Despite the growth in corporate giving, the record is all too clear: Relatively few businesses give at all. Most give very little. Despite all the rhetoric, small businesses give proportionately more than big corporations. Local business gives far more than national corporations.

According to a recent Conference Board study, only 30 percent of America's 2 million corporations report any charitable gifts at all on their income tax. The national average of those who give remains just over 1 percent of pretax profits.

And he concludes:

Ladies and gentlemen, if we cannot improve on that record during the 1980's, we can count on a swift return to primary dependence on government.

I'm not going to let the rest of you off the hook, either. The worst offender in the community affairs world is the fat cat sitting on top of a 5 percent corporate giving commitment who spreads it all around the community in pygmy grants to every group that makes a professional presentation. You can't make a difference in your community with that strategy. You have the potential to be an effective corporate citizen, but you are wasting it on the quantitative yardstick of good feeling, rather than using it to make a qualitative change in your community. You might just as well pay it in taxes. I'll put it to work.

I will raise another aspect of community citizenship. To whom do you owe a responsibility when your company locates a new plant? Do you answer only to the shareholder and seek the spot with the lowest tax assessment? Or do you consider the fiscal disparities problem that I mentioned earlier and realize that your choice to move to the suburbs—multiplied thousands of times in the corporate world—is the cause of the infrastructure problem that we face in the 1980's.

It's the free rider problem. It's in your rational—bottom line-interest to avoid the high tax burden of the center city. But everytime one of you moves out, the tax load on the rest increases and the flight to the periphery excelerates. Last out loses. Why can't you be responsible for breaking that cycle? It's your cycle. And it's the cause of a list of federal programs as long as your arm. Programs that you blame us for creating. As Business Week points out when the federal balloon bursts, it is you who will be punished by the infrastructure problem.

Employee Responsibility.—The relationship between the employer and the employee has the potential to be an enormous force for change in our society. I think of health care, job training, pensions, recreation, the work trip, child care. In everyone of these areas a new relationship between the employer and the employee could provide substantial benefits for both and for society as well.

Consider the work trip.—Organized entirely by the employee in most cases. And as a result we have a system based on convenience and personal mobility. Think for a moment what that system might look like, if the employer were responsible for the work trip.

Health care is just the other way around. Organized by the employer with little incentive for cost control. Here we need to move toward consumer choice so that our health care demands are limited by our needs and not passed on cost-free by the employer.

Social Responsibility.—The first principle of Reaganomics is that the private market more efficiently allocates resources than the government. To that we can all agree. But the absence of government has never been proof that private markets are functioning as the textbooks describe. There is no two-legged creature on earth more illiterate on the subject of markets than the corporate executive. You owe the society better, because society looks to you for leadership on these questions.

The windfall profits tax.—I received a thousand letters opposing the windfall profits tax. 970 were from corporate executives questioning my commitment to market allocations. We don't have an energy marketplace in this country. The marginal barrel of our oil—the world's oil—is produced by Saudi Arabia. And they with their OPEC partners set a cartel price. A price that has tripled overnight twice in the last decade. Is that how a marketplace behaves? You profess commitment to the marketplace. Why don't you get the blinders off and try to understand its fundamental principles. In the world of Reaganomics, you will have to, because the President certainly doesn't.

I do think it's time for a new social contract between the four basics of the institutions in our society. I say with confidence that we can change the role of the federal government. We can realize the opportunities of the new age. And the surprising thing is that we are on the right track. But let me leave you and the President with one more quote from Will Rogers. For some reason he said, "Even those who are on the right track will get hit if they just sit there."

The President needs to move us on a new agenda in January. I hope the few thoughts I have shared today can be part of our new beginning.

CHANGING THE ROLE OF GOVERNMENT IN OUR LIVES

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, on February 10, 1982, I came to the floor of the Senate, along with several other people, to speak to the budget dilemma. That was the first time we focused on 150-plus budget deficits. I recall at that time those who were on the floor that day—the junior Senator from South Carolina being one that comes to mind, who spoke in terms of freezing the budget in place—were lauded for their temerity in taking on this issue. I took my time that morning to go back and address the whole issue of whether the budget is as simple as cutting spending or holding spending down or reforming the tax system. I concluded that the answer to what is wrong with this whole system is a relatively simple answer—that we in this country started to go wrong when we started to believe that balancing the budget and changing the role of Government in our lives were not directly interrelated. Because, in fact, they are intimately tied together. We are never going to balance the national budget until we change the role Government plays in the lives of the people of this country. We shall never balance the budget unless we get to the underlying fundamental policies that drive the budget numbers higher and higher despite our historic efforts last year—1981—to slow the rate of growth in Government spending. In effect, I said, we cannot afford to stay the course. We must balance the budget by changing the role of Government.

I went on and made some suggestions, I said:

Don't try to change the whole thing overnight; pick one or two areas and get the American public behind this process of changing the role of government.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that particular speech, delivered here on February 10, 1982, appear in sequence in the RECORD with the first speech.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BALANCE THE BUDGET BY CHANGING THE ROLE OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, 6 years ago, a former one-term Governor from Georgia was campaigning for the Presidency on two promises: that he would change the role of the National Government and the lives of the people of this country, and that he would balance the Federal budget.

Two years ago, a former two-term Governor from California was campaigning for the Presidency on two promises: that he would change the role of the National Government and the lives of the people of this country, and that he would balance the Federal budget.

That first Governor, Jimmy Carter, failed. In the 4 years of his Presidency, the national budget grew to record heights and, despite a doubling of tax collections, annual deficits became shockingly large. Following on the heels of this uncontrolled spending came disastrous inflation and interest rates.

Many in this country, and many in this Congress, are beginning to wonder if the second Governor elected for the Presidency on the platform of the same promises will suffer the same fate.

Instead of a balanced budget by 1984, we are now told that maybe—maybe, if everything goes right—we can balance the budget by 1987. Instead of budget surpluses we are faced with record deficits. Instead of continuing on the path of tax reform, the call for tax increases is growing louder.

The country is asking their politicians one simple question: What went wrong?

The answer is just as simple: We started to go wrong when we started to believe that the two promises of balancing the budget and changing the role of Government were not directly interrelated.

In fact, they are intimately tied. We will never balance the national budget until we change the role Government plays in the lives of the people of this country. We will never balance the budget unless we get to the underlying, fundamental policies that drive the budget numbers higher and higher despite our historic efforts last year to slow the rate of growth in Government spending.

We cannot afford to stay on that course. We must balance the budget by changing the role of Government.

And why should we care if the budget is balanced? The desire to balance the budget is the desire to change the role of the Federal Government. Until we do, public tolerance of Government will not improve.

Last year's historic changes in spending and taxation were long overdue. But, we cannot afford to spend another 12 months focusing only on budget numbers while ignoring budget policy.

I am prepared to make the tough decisions that will lead us to a balanced budget. I am prepared to work with my President to reduce the growth in Government spending. But I am not prepared to spend this year focusing only on the 15 percent of the budget that funds the so-called discretionary social programs.

If the theme of the 1980's is to do more, more efficiently, with less, that is the theme that has to apply to every area of Government activity—including the military, including the public works projects that Members of Congress prize so dearly, and including the energy heavy construction projects like the Clinch River breeder reactor. It is a theme that has to apply to every area of Government activity. I cannot support a 50-percent cutback in Federal support for higher education, particularly when other, less damaging options are available. I would much rather build one less destroyer, or defer the construction of two more dams. I would rather defer some heavy construction projects whose benefits are decades away, than cut deeply into programs that have an immediate and irreplaceable impact on human needs. I am convinced that the great majority of the people in this country share those feelings.

It would be a serious mistake to misinterpret these comments—or the President's proposals, for that matter—as a retreat from the basic Republican commitment to a balanced Federal budget. With Federal borrowing stealing 30 cents out of every dollar saved by the American people, a balanced budget is an economic necessity. But in a larger sense, balancing the Federal budget is an issue of trust between elected officials and the people they represent. It is a symbol of the political accountability that every voter has a right to demand. I care deeply about the fiscal crisis we have built toward for the past 20 years, and I am prepared to make whatever short-run sacrifices are necessary to restore long-term economic stability. The issue is not one of goals, but of means.

All of this just serves to highlight how essential it is to grasp the real message of budget deficits. The American people have been using elections and referendums for several years to tell elected officials to find better ways to meet the needs of America. Their message has been simple. "Find a better way—this one costs too much and produces too little."

The problems created by the hundred-fifty-billion-dollar deficit are far too severe to be solved with just another series of cuts, caps, and blocks. No one believes we can eliminate a $150 billion deficit by beating on a $90 billion Federal pipeline. My sense is that Republicans in the Senate will be chary about going along with that strategy again this year. We are not going to do anything like the reconciliation exercise that we engaged in a year ago. That could mean we will spend a whole year arguing about the specifics of the President's budget message, without getting much accomplished.

I hope that will not be the outcome, because that can only mean that we are one year further away from balancing spending with the revenues generated by new tax policies that are approaching fundamental sensibility. The President is absolutely right when he stresses the need to accomplish something this year, so I have a suggestion.

Rather than focus on the whole budget again, I think we should concentrate on two or three areas of Federal activity. In those areas we ought to examine thoroughly the structure of Federal policy and make some decisions about the long-range future. We ought to revamp our policy and the role of the Federal Government in implementing it so that when we are done with this year, we will have made some important contribution to balancing the budget in the long run, even if only in a few areas. We did that with tax policy last year, so we know how much revenue to expect. We could do it with two or three big-ticket items this year and be much closer to the balanced budget than we would be if we just look at cutting, capping, and blocking for the next 8 months.

The areas I would go into in depth are health, defense, and assistance to State and local governments. Taking the last one first, the Federal Government currently provides about $90 billion worth of grants to State and local governments. In his state of the Union message the President announced a major new federalism initiative that would restructure that entire series of programs. We ought not to lose the new federalism in the debate on budget cuts. We would accomplish a lot more if we forgot about the cuts and pushed ahead with the new federalism initiative.

Second, in the area of health care, today, the Federal Government spends $76 billion on health care for American citizens, who spend an additional $250 billion. It is the domestic program with the largest rate of growth, in the neighborhood of 20 to 25 percent a year. It is the second largest industry in the United States and if we do not do something to reform the way we finance the provision of health care in this country, even the Federal Government, with a $100 billion deficit, will not be able to afford it.

Third, is defense. The President has a flat commitment to increase defense spending by at least 7 percent per year for the foreseeable future. We simply cannot afford to make blanket commitments like that, and Congress will not go along with the kind of buildup that is reflected in the budget. We have to have a full-fledged debate on the future defense policy and program for the United States. We have to bring Congress and the President into agreement on where we are heading for the long term. We ought to have that debate, in depth, this year. It ought to decide MX, B-1, and the other issues once and for all.

Focusing on these three areas means that other areas will not receive as much attention. We ought to set as a goal doing three more next year. I would suggest income security policy, much of the so-called safety net of entitlement programs, which have been put off for a variety of reasons until next year anyway. I would suggest also housing—shelter—and the civil service system.

Let me say one final thing about the budget and the budget process. Some people, I think, suspect that the President intends to largely abolish the Federal Government with the exception of defense and social security. That is a lot of abolishing because the Federal Government is currently involved in thousands of programs. Some of them we really do not have any business doing and they ought to be eliminated. But there are important national roles beyond defense and social security. I think of environmental research. How do we know what substances are toxic to man? Consumers cannot find that out for themselves and 50 environmental research programs run by the States are duplicative and wasteful.

I think of higher education. Higher education has been a Federal role since the Morrill Act in 1862 that established land grant colleges in Abraham Lincoln's administration. Higher education is a necessary underpinning for the success of our Nation's economy.

I think of the Federal role in supporting refugees until they find a place in our society. The Federal role in preserving wilderness, or in supporting museums that preserve our cultural heritage.

There are Federal roles beyond defense and social security.

I fear that we are about to enter a big battle over these budget numbers that will do the Nation little long-term good. In the end, we will have come no closer to balancing the budget, because we will have made no progress in reshaping basic policy. And all the interest groups will spend a whole year fighting the administration of these issues whether the specific cuts are reasonable or not. It would be far better if Congress spent the year working on two or three issues and the interest groups spent the year focusing on the few narrow purposes that are truly Federal in preparation for other basic debates that will come in the future.

If we are to make rational public policy, we must approach policymaking in a more rational manner. Above all we need to focus, to recognize that the task of changing Government's role in the host of social areas it touches is too great a task to be accomplished in a single year.

The 1981 tax debate is an example of how the process should work. The fundamental changes embodied in the estate tax reform, the IRA's, depreciation changes, child care credits, and other sections of the tax bill are the foundation on which the property of the next generation of Americans rests. The policy changes involved included lowering the rewards for consumption and the penalties for saving and investment; the elimination of the national tax on inflation—by indexing—and on death—estate tax reform—and the accomplishment of the first phase of social security reform through the protection from tax provided that portion of earnings committed to voluntary pension contributions and individual retirement accounts and Keogh plans.

The process that produced that bill worked because Congress focused its efforts on a single area, resisted short-term remedies and addressed the fundamental issues underlying national tax policies.

We now need to apply the same discipline in the Government spending policy. When we have succeeded in reassessing Government's role in the essential areas of health, defense, income security, housing, civil service, and in the assistance through State and local governments we can look again to the Federal tax system.

Starting in the 1983-84 biennium we can complete our efforts to reform the nonproductive portions of the tax policy. Then by the 1985-86 biennium we address the tax system as a revenue raiser—we make a final judgment on the levels of revenue needed to support the levels of public services we have deemed essential.

If the President were to commit himself to support a constitutional amendment to require the Federal Government to balance its budget this would not be a bad year to start the process of presenting the amendment if the amendment were to be effective for fiscal year 1987, it would be a challenge to the last session of the 99th Congress. By no special coincidence this would also be the year that 16 Republican Senators, elected with President Ronald Reagan, to the first Republican Senate majority in 26 years return to the electorate to determine whether or not the real message of the elections and referendums of the last 6 years really mean what I believe, that is "Find a better way."

President Reagan will earn his place in history for a variety of reasons. But the most important of those reasons is likely to be his role in beginning this process of policy reevaluation. The process is a partnership between the President, the Congress and the people of this country—an affirmation of the basic pluralism that forms the strength of American society. The President has done his part, and the challenge is now in our hands.

DOMESTIC REFORMS IN THE ROLE OF GOVERNMENT IN THE BUDGET

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, on December 7, 1983, I was privileged to be on a panel with several noted experts on the subject of changing the role of government at a conference sponsored by the Murray & Agnes Seasongood Good Government Fund in Cincinnati, Ohio. I took that occasion to follow the theory that you cannot change the budget problems in this country unless you change the role of government in this country.

I went on to suggest that domestic reforms in particular, the budget process, regulatory reform, tax reform, and a reform of the relationships of the various levels of government in this country, were at the heart of solving the problem of the role of government in our lives.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that those remarks be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY SENATOR DAVE DURENBERGER

Thank you, ladies and gentlemen. It is a pleasure and honor to be with you this morning.

We are here this morning to speak of changing the role of government. It is a cause close to my heart. Those are precisely the five words I use to describe why I first ran for the U.S. Senate—and why I was elected. To change the role of government. And it is a big cause. Over the last decade, Congress has attempted four major domestic reforms: The budget process; regulatory reform; tax reform, and New Federalism. Each is at the heart of changing the role of government. All have either died or are on their last legs.

These reforms deal with the principal activities of government. Spending. Taxation. Regulation. Who does what in a Federal system? None successful. They are needed, because the American people have come to see the National Government as the Government, and not as our Government. It is no longer the faithful servant of their interests to be trusted with their ideals. Why did we fail and how can we take up that effort again? Let us look at each arena in its turn and see what happened.

SPENDING

Let us begin where every discussion in Washington begins these days, with the budget problems of the National Government. What does the abstraction of the Federal budget represent? Should we be concerned about $200 billion deficits this year, next year, the year after that, rising to $300 billion by the end of this decade?

Balancing the budget has become an issue of trust between every politician and his or her constituents—between me and my fellow Minnesotans. The desire to balance the budget is the desire to change the role of government, because without fundamental changes in the way we do things, the gap between spending and revenues will continue to grow.

There are some who are not concerned about the deficit. They will point out that we owe it to ourselves. That everybody borrows. The total debt in this country—government, business, and consumer—is something like $6 trillion. Dave Stockman began the budget cycle this year by comparing the current debt of the U.S. Government and GNP with debt in the past, and found that the percentages were not remarkably different.

Soon we may even hear that it is cheaper to borrow than to tax. A tax increase would dampen the recovery. We would lose tax revenue as a result of lost economic growth. We would be forced to spend more on income security programs. And the deficit would be higher than it is now. If we increase taxes to close the gap, the deficit would acutally grow. We would have to borrow more.

Well, that's the point of no return. And the words of Thomas Jefferson become a moral imperative. Let me quote him: "The question of whether one generation has the right to bind another by the debt it imposes is a question of such consequence as to place it among the fundamental principles of any government. We should consider ourselves unauthorized to saddle posterity with our debts, and morally bound to pay them ourselves."

The principle is that you leave the next generation with opportunities for choice no less than your own. That is why this Nation has always been willing to fight to preserve its liberties. That is why we, as a people, put such a high value on environmental protection and the conservation of natural resources. And it is a fundamental issue in the deficits we currently face.

We will have to change the role of government to solve the budget problem. There are no easy budget tricks to redefine the Federal purpose. Waste, fraud and abuse . . . pork barrel, boondoggle, handouts . . . cut every nickel and you can't solve the budget problem. In fact, it's not a budget problem. It's a policy problem that cuts across every aspect of government.

Consider the four basic components on the spending side of the Federal budget: Entitlements, interest payments, defense spending, and discretionary social programs.

Entitlements: Social security, railroad retirement, medicare, medicaid, food stamps, veterans' pensions, civil service retirement. An inflation-indexed system of cash payments with the ratio of those who are entitled to those who are paying growing every year.

Interest payments: You have to pay them. At 8 or 9 percent on $1.4 trillion of debt, they are becoming a substantial percentage of our annual expenses. The combination of entitlements and interest payments now makes up 56 percent of the Federal budget.

Defense spending: To keep it afloat in a sea of red ink, we have copied the trick from entitlements and inflation-proofed our national security policy, as well. We no longer judge it by what it defends or how adequately, but by how much real growth—growth over and above inflation—is included in the defense budget. Reagan wants 10 percent real growth. Congress gave 3 percent plus for 1984. Defense spending is 27 percent of the budget.

Discretionary social programs: Partly Federal operations. Partly grants to State and local governments. Highways, sewage treatment plants, national parks, elementary and secondary education, EPA and the FBI, Amtrak, NASA, agricultural extension. Onethousand and one-hundred programs of assistance to governments, businesses, and individuals. Seventeen percent of the Federal budget and the only portion not indexed to inflation and interest rates by law or policy.

You could eliminate this entire category of Federal spending—all of the Federal establishment but for defense, interest payments, and a handful of entitlements—and still not close the gap between spending and revenues.

Spending a deficit is like having a credit card with the bill sent to your kids. Can we, in good conscience, use those promissory notes to have life cushy now, knowing that our children will pay the carrying charges for the rest of their lives? Do we have the right to limit their opportunities to choose in that way?

At $200 billion annually, it's gotten to the point where we are constraining our own choices, as well. When Ronald Reagan came into office, the accumulated debt was in the $900 billion range. At the end of his first term, it will stand near $1.6 trillion. A 75 percent increase in one term. Whoever is sworn in as President in January 1985 will face as his or her first task the submission of a budget to the Congress. And the first $70 billion in that budget will have to be used to make interest payments on the debt rung up since January 1981.

Seventy billion dollars is the cost of medicare, our second largest social program. If we hadn't borrowed to meet the oh-so urgent needs of 1981, 1982, 1983, and 1984—we could pay for medicare in 1985 with the interest savings. Repeal the 1.3 percent payroll tax, repeal the premiums and copayments facing the elderly and flat out pay for medicare with the interest savings. Those are the kinds of choices even our generation faces when deficits are $200 billion annually.

In the absence of any simple budget tricks to solve the deficit problem, it sometimes seems that cut spending can only mean taking programs away from people or the strength out of our defense. Cut in this sense means raise the retirement age for social security, don't pay for liver transplants under medicaid, decrease the numbers eligible for student loans, and don't build this bomber or that missile.

Popular wisdom has it that Americans won't support those kinds of cuts! They don't want less income security or national security. They don't want a shorter menu of Government services. And popular wisdom may be right.

But I've always thought there can be another meaning to cut spending. We can provide the same level of service—of public benefit—with fewer dollars, if we use each dollar more wisely—target each to our highest priorities.

Let me use medicare as an example. Medicare, by all accounts, is in deep trouble. Just like social security was threatened with bankruptcy until the compromise package passed earlier this year, it appears that the medicare trust fund will go into deficit sometime in this decade and in a big way.

We have already responded with a series of minor reforms. Some were very sensible including the shift to a prospective payment system and the experimental medicare vouchers. But in most cases, all we have done is shift minor costs from the government to other users of the health care system and back onto the beneficiaries.

What we need to realize is that the medicare problem is only a symptom of a problem affecting our whole health care system. It is not a health care but a sick care system. We don't make enough use of wellness services which can diminish the need for the high cost sick care services. And when we do use sick care, we use entirely too much of it because we consumers are not in control. The choice of tests and treatments is left up to the professionals and they bill the costs to an insurance company or Government agency for reimbursement. These institutions have no way to control costs because they have no role in the decision to consume services—or to use other services that might prevent the need for sick care altogether.

What we need to break this pattern—to take inflation out of the health care system and preserve medicare at more modest levels of Federal expenditure—is a consumer who makes choices and is, at least in some part, directly responsible for the cost of those choices.

The medicare example can be repeated again and again in other areas of governmental service both at the Federal and in State and local government. Elementary and secondary education . . . commuter transportation . . . housing . . . long term care. Cut spending doesn't have to mean just take something away. It can mean do things better, more wisely, so that we get the same benefit at a lesser cost. Government needs to change its role from financing institutions to enabling people as consumers. It's a theme I will return to again at the end of these comments.

TAXATION

Taxation: There are those, of course, who will recommend that we balance the budget by raising taxes. In fact, the other day, I read an article that said the only fair way to balance the budget is to raise taxes. Because everyone pays them. Whereas spending cuts must necessarily affect only the few and selectively.

Well, by that argument, everyone should pay 100 percent of their income in taxes and the Government should pass out the revenues according to some estimate of peoples' needs. We are not that kind of society. What we need to do is decide how much of our total income will be spent by government and then fairly apportion the obligation to pay. A blanket endorsement of tax increases doesn't help.

The fairness issue: Do we have a deficit because the 1981 tax cut gave the cupboard to the rich? Kemp-Roth was an across-the-board tax cut of 25 percent. Yes, the rich do get more dollars in tax relief, because they pay more in taxes in the first place. But the structure of the tax code—the relationship of one bracket to another and its tax rate—remains the same.

Indexing—which hasn't taken effect yet—actually provides substantially more benefit to the lower than the higher brackets. At the lower end of the income scale, the brackets are much narrower and the slope of the tax rate increase from bracket to bracket much steeper. Indexing keeps the average and lower than average wage-earner from sliding up that slope with inflation. For the truly rich—those with incomes in six figures—indexing is of no value at all. They will always pay 50 percent of income in taxes whatever the rate of inflation.

Finally, on the fairness issue—one must remember that Kemp-Roth and indexing were only part of the 1981 tax act. Only one-third of the revenue loss. What is really hurting now are all of the other baubles—new loopholes—added to the bill.

Most people in this room will nod their heads to the assertion that the Federal Government is a lousy allocator of resources. But few of you judge your latest tax break that way. It has come to the point where more goes out the backdoor of the Treasury through loopholes than comes in through the front door as tax payments. Truly, the value of credits, deductions, and exemptions in reducing taxes owed will soon exceed the value of taxes paid. Do we want a corporate income tax that collects only small amounts of revenue—less than 5 percent of Federal expenditures in the current fiscal year—but functions as a significant regulator of investment through the Internal Revenue Code? And do you know what the Tax Code does for consumer borrowing and the price of the average house in America.

The American public is not one bit fooled about who is paying taxes and who isn't. Try to convince them that the Tax Code is fair. That the way to solve the deficit problem is to jack up the rates and leave the system in place. They are ready to junk the current system and go to a consumption tax or a flat tax—anything to get a fresh start on the fairness problem.

We have done half of tax reform. We have brought down the rates. Now we need to broaden the base. And in the process, we will end the role of the Internal Revenue Code as a regulator of savings, investment, and consumption in this Nation.

REGULATION

In the United States, we tolerate regulation by a Government bureau in four cases . . . to protect consumers from the excesses of monopoly . . . to limit market externalities . . . to compensate for imperfect or incomplete information . . . and to guarantee equal opportunity.

Historically, regulation took the form of limitations—control prices, restrict access to markets, prohibit certain products or practices—in response to the reality of monopoly providers. This type of regulation began with the Interstate Commerce Commission in the 1880's and continued to expand through the 1930's. The industries subject to this type of regulation became very comfortable with the arrangement. The stable environment provided by regulation became preferred to the uncertainty of competition.

We only belatedly realized that as our economy grew and changed, competition forced its way into these industries. Deregulation—the first wave of regulatory reform to sweep the Congress—recognizes that the consumer will be better served by competition than by regulation. Deregulation of airlines, trucking, rail freight, banking, and perhaps communications, has and will continue to change the role of government.

But more recently, regulation has taken another form and become an important force in allocating investment in our society. This new type of regulation—well-illustrated by the environmental legislation of the 1970's—tends to focus on limiting the externalities of commercial and industrial activity.

Catalytic converters, sulfur dioxide scrubbers, vapor recovery systems, sewage treatment plants, air bags in automobiles . . . all are examples of this new type of regulation.

The theory behind this new regulatory form is surprisingly audacious. It suggests that whenever a net benefit can be gained for society through regulatory intervention, a regulatory program ought to be imposed. So long as the cost/benefit ratio is positive on the benefit side, we act to regulate. That's the theory. And we do so without regard to the cumulative cost of all regulations built up through this calculus made one regulation at a time.

That's a silly calculus. It's as if a family saw the benefit in having a new stove and refrigerator, new washer and dryer, new curtains and carpets, new his and her autos and towels, and set out to acquire a household of new furnishings without regard to the total cost or the balance in their checkbook. People don't do that with their money, as a rule. Congressmen have been doing it with your money for the last decade. Benefit maximization has been a compelling theory.

As the costs of benefit maximization continued to climb—and they are now estimated at $120 billion annually—Congress began to move on a second kind of regulatory reform. It was packaged as a major initiative in the first weeks of 1981 and as a high priority for the Reagan administration.

S. 1080, the regulatory reform act in the 97th and 98th Congresses, would mandate the measurement of cost and benefits . . . one regulation at a time. It would require that the least costly alternative to achieve the regulatory goal be imposed . . . one regulation at a time. It would give the Office of Management and Budget new authority over the agencies so that every nickel of cost could be counted . . . one regulation at a time.

S. 1080—regulatory reform—has now largely been shelved by the Congress. And it is well that it has. Because it wasn't the kind of change we needed. It enshrined the benefit maximization theory as our first principle of regulatory management. Light years behind the tools we need to balance the general interest with the claims of specific regulatory programs.

What is the general interest? It is the checkbook interest. How much regulatory benefit can we afford each year without halting the forces of economic growth? We cannot, I would insist, afford to buy every benefit in sight every year. How do we get a checkbook—a benefits plan—that tells us how much we can afford?

There is a concept floating around called the regulatory budget—another one of those bad names for a good idea—which I think could change the role of government in the regulatory arena.

The regulatory budget begins with a cost/benefit analysis for each regulatory program as a building block. But it doesn't stop after the simple determination that benefits exceed costs. It builds. It goes on to ask whether the economy as a whole can afford all of the costs. Take the price tag for each regulation projected out over 4 or 5 years. Break them down industry by industry. Find out how much the steel industry, for instance, will pay for clean water and clean air and worker safety for each year for the next 5 years. And then look at the financial condition of the steel industry to see if it can afford the cumulative cost of the regulatory programs we have adopted.

If not, then benefits don't really exceed costs because the health of the American steel industry is not something we included in our calculus done one regulation at a time. We will need to adjust the regulatory requirements. Stretch out the deadlines a bit. We may even learn that we can gain more benefit by shifting priorities from one program to another. Something we couldn't see when we looked at the world one regulation at a time.

That, to me, is regulatory reform. We need to consider the total costs of all regulations and the impact of those costs on the health of each of our industries through a regulatory budget. Yes, we will continue to regulate externalities in our society to improve the quality of life—but on a schedule that we can afford.

FEDERALISM

One of the most important efforts to change the role of government in recent years is often called New Federalism. In fact, starting with the Eisenhower administration, every President has had his own personal version of the New Federalism.

To understand why it is important, you need to know a little bit about the structure of the current Federal partnership. It is focused on the grant-in-aid system. We have some 400 grant programs that provide aid to State and local governments. It is estimated that these grants transfer about $90 billion a year from the Federal Treasury to the programs run by State and local governments. The system is complex and confusing. We have 35 grants for highways, about 100 for health care, 40 or more for elementary and secondary education, 4 or 5 for energy conservation, a half-dozen for libraries, 7 for fire protection, several for waste water treatment in several different agencies, grants for mass transit, job training, housing, urban parks, the arts and humanities. The list is endless. State and local officials feel a duty to go to Washington to beg for aid. And the aid they get comprises about one-fifth of their budgets. A larger percentage than State income taxes.

It has been called "cooperative federalism." But it is a land of conflict. A struggle for authority between the Union and the States and it is no secret that the National Government is winning. We use the conditional character of the grant—the "here's some money if you do this" character of the grant—to control the policies and priorities of State and local governments.

In this land of conflict, every President since Eisenhower has wanted to be a peacemaker. President Eisenhower appointed two commissions on intergovernmental relations with the purpose of recommending which grants and tax resources could be returned to State and local governments. They looked over the whole landscape and decided that one grant, for waste water treatment—and one tax, on telephone services, could be returned to the States. That was 1960. Last year, 1982, the Congress authorized $2.4 billion for waste water treatment and doubled the Federal telephone tax.

The newest peace initiative, of course, is President Reagan's "single, bold stroke" to realign responsibilities and resources in our Federal system which he announced in the 1982 State of the Union. After a year of negotiation, it came to the Hill as four block grants. Frankly, Eisenhower's plan stood a better chance of being passed by the Congress. But we have learned some important lessons watching the Reagan initiative. I would like to share one with you today.

Not all of the frustration with the Federal partnership can be laid at the doorstep of Washington. One of the major problems is out here in our metropolitan communities. It is the problem of boundaries laid down between local governments in a bygone era that serve as insulators between the services demanded by a modern economy and the wealth that economy creates. In the Twin Cities of Minnesota, for instance, there are 195 units of local government in the seven-county metropolitan area. And all of them are inclined to go their own way on taxes and spending.

States, particularly in the Northeast and Midwest, have refused to let central cities grow to their economic horizons or to use fiscal mechanisms that can capture the wealth that they create through the services they provide. Local government officials of the center city remain largely tied to the property tax for their own-source revenues while the wealth being created in the form of income by their services is making itself available as the bedroom suburb in another jurisdiction.

Cooperative federalism—the intergovernmental grant system—was invented in part as a response to this problem. We impose the Federal income tax on the suburb and send the revenues back to the city as an array of grant programs. And they come with strings. Decisions which would be better made within the metropolitan community are transferred to the State Capitol or to Washington.

I am convinced that every stable economic community can afford the public services necessary to sustain its level of economic organization. I am also convinced that it would be far better for each community to raise the revenue and provide the services with its own political and fiscal process, rather than be acted on by a redistributing agent from the outside. But the political boundaries and fiscal mechanisms of local government in America have made a different kind of federalism largely impossible. Changing the role of government at the national level in this case will have to be preceded by real and far-reaching reforms at the grassroots of government.

PLURALISM

Federalism is an important theme in redefining the role of the National Government. But lately, I find another concept competes for attention. Federalism focuses on the structure of government. But the scope of the national debate on changing the role of government has reached beyond a single-minded concentration on the problems of government. We have an old word in the American lexicon, pluralism, that may be more descriptive than federalism of the direction in which we need to be headed.

We have for basic institutions in our society. The family . . . the business firm . . . our religious and voluntary associations . . . and the government. History has considered us a great society beause we have all four and because we have valued and preserved each in its purpose.

There are many factors that contribute to the success of a great nation. There are natural resources . . . geography. There are the men and women of intellect and hope who devote their lives to the public good. But I daresay that the genius of America is to be found in the love of our families, the prosperity of our business, in the values of our voluntary associations, and in the form of our government. It is to these roots that we should always return when it seems we have lost our way. And it is in understanding the distinct role of each of these four institutions and the balance between them that our strength is to be found.

As we seek to change the role of government, we should not lose sight of its basic purpose. For business, it defends the shores, maintains order, and, I want to say, preserves the value of the currency. For the family, government provides protection against the misfortunes of our economic system. From the fruits of profit and income, we get the resources necessary to provide every citizen with the dignity, security and opportunities that are the measure of a great nation. For the voluntary association, government's basic guarantees are the right to assemble, the right to speak freely, and the right to advocate change. Life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

But of late, government has taken on a much broader role. It seems that every day, someone is thinking of something new that government ought to be doing. Government has become a major provider of services . . . from education to transit to recreation to job training to family counseling to housing to health care. Quite often, as government moves into a service area, the other institutions have moved out giving up their traditional roles.

Today, the public agency which acts as a service producer often has a monopoly on that service. But public services could be offered in a competitive environment where many producers of the same service would compete for a share of the market. Other producers might include the neighborhood self-help organizations, foundations, and nonprofits, or even profitmaking corporations.

Today, most citizens have little choice in selecting the kinds of public services they will receive, the amount of service they will consume, the producer of the service, or the allocation of their dollars across the range of services. Choice is lost when a public bureaucracy offers a single homogeneous service to the entire population and pays for it out of the general fund.

I have become convinced that if the role of government is to change, we must reverse the tendency toward providing more and more in the public sector with government as the producer. The role of government should be to enable people to get the services they need. But that does not mean that government has to produce the services, as well. We can give more of the job of producing the services back to the other institutions of our society.

Like the other themes I've mentioned this morning—spending, taxation, regulation, federalism—it will not be easy to change the role of government as service provider. But the promise is that we can keep up with change in the needs and wants of our citizens, if we restore the balance between all four of our basic institutions. Giving the responsibility for choice back to people—not just back to governments closer to people—but to people with access and options among all of our institutions is the key to changing the role of government.

Thank you.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a speech that I delivered to the Minnesota Association of Counties in Bloomington, Minn., on January 30, 1984, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR DAVE DURENBERGER

This is the time of year for thoughtful speeches. Each year at this time, Congress assembles and the Nation pauses to get a report from the President on the State of the Union. It is also a time to look ahead. The State of the Union message . . . and Ronald Reagan delivered his fourth last week . . . usually contains a long list of promises and proposals that the President would like Congress to adopt in the coming year.

Once every four years we are also asked to consider a very different kind of message in early January . . . an inaugural message to set the tone for a new administration. It is a statement that looks beyond the day-to-day business of government to the spirit of the nation. Typically, the Inaugural is mood music and the State of the Union, marching orders.

But this is not a typical year or a typical President. President Reagan's President's speech last Wednesday was more mood than march . . . heavy on the spirit and light on the business of government. And the mood is Stay the Course.

Inflation has been whipped. Hallelujah. Unemployment is way down. Three million more Americans are working today than when Fritz Mondale left office. Hallelujah. The recovery has arrived. Hallelujah. Stay the course. Hallelujah. And by the way . . . cut a few programs, don't touch taxes and continue my military buildup. Stay the course.

As a Republican, I should be glad that Stay the Course has become a hit tune. A year ago, only Ronald Reagan wanted to stay the course. And I had to plead with him not to sing it in Minnesota. Today, even Rudy Perpich is heard humming a few bars.

And the reason is obvious. An economic recovery has arrived. The Sunday business section of the Washington Post carried a banner headline, "Optimism Growing Over Global Economy." And beneath it was a cartoon of a happy little train starting up the hill of recovery. The locomotive was labeled USA and our economy was pulling France, Japan, Italy, Great Britain and West Germany out of the tunnel of recession and up the hill of growth. You look at the picture and you hear the childhood story . . . I think I can . . . I think I can . . . I think I can . . .

And the American people think we can. More startling than any economic news is the evidence from the pollsters taking the pulse of public opinion. Since the dawn of that magic art, pollsters have asked the public a simple question, "Do you think things will be better or worse at this time next year?" It's the optimism index.

And it has developed a classic pattern. On the day after the Inaugural, at the beginning of each new administration, "better" is way ahead of "worse." People are optimistic on that first day. But even on that first day the erosion has already set in. "Better" declines continuously. By midterm, "worse" has pulled even. And pessimism takes a commanding lead by the next election day. And on that day, a pessimistic people switches presidents and the process starts all over again. It's been that way for more than twenty years.

But this is not a typical year. "Better" made a comeback one year early for Ronald Reagan. For the first time in twenty years the American public is going into a presidential election believing that things are going to be better next year. And by a wide margin. So it's stay the course. Don't rock the boat by marching us off in new directions.

The last time that optimism took hold in mid-term was twenty-one years ago, in 1963, as John Kennedy took up his pen to write a State of the Union. The Cuban missile crisis was just behind us. The nation was coming out of a recession. The peace had been saved. People were going back to work. Optimism was in the air. Perhaps the Washington Post ran the same picture of the little train starting up the hill.

But President Kennedy didn't ask the nation to stay the course. He looked at that train and he said . . . you know, as good as it feels to be out of the tunnel of despair, that little train is only on the side of the hill. And he asked two questions. How shall we get to the top of the hill . . . to a vigorous growing economy once again? And what will we see when we get there? What opportunities and challenges lie beyond that hill . . . what is our vision of America's mission for this decade and the rest of the century?

In 1963, Kennedy's answer to the first question was a supply-side tax cut. At a time when things were running fairly well, he challenged Congress to cut taxes by $15 billion to provide the fuel for a full recovery. And it succeeded beyond anyone's expectations. It gave us our Laffer's Curve, Jack Kemp's theories and supply side economics.

Today, the challenge is different. It is not taxes, but government borrowing that threatens to keep us on the side of the hill. The fuel we need is lower interest rates . . . credit that we can afford . . . for the small business men and women to risk on new ventures, for the farmer to get the seed in the ground, for the young family to buy a first home and for the high school graduates to go off to college to reach their full potential.

But we find government standing first in line at the credit window. Demanding to go before all other Americans. Willing to pay more in interest than most can afford. Borrowing more than any of us could imagine a few short years ago.

Ronald Reagan let us know that he cares about $200 billion deficits, but only enough to make a downpayment this year. Frankly, there are others who believe a downpayment is all that is needed.

Borrowing is not the original sin. It is not being committed for the first time. And the federal government certainly isn't the only sinner. The total debt in this country—government, business and consumer—approaches six trillion dollars. We are all borrowers for cars and houses and vacations and business investments.

And even in the narrow circle of government. Borrowing is not just a federal problem. You may at times hear pious words from some state and local officials . . . you may speak them yourselves . . . to the effect that state and local governments have to balance their budgets every year. That it's only the spendthrifts in Washington who know no discipline.

Well, state and local governments borrow a tremendous amount. Their balance is in operation expenses and annual revenues, only. Most of their capital programs are not part of this balancing process, but are paid for by bonds. And in their annual operating revenues, state and local governments count $90 billion in federal aid—one fifth of their total budgets—to make it come out even each year.

So there is a school of thought that says borrowing is a relative question. Dave Stockman started last year's budget cycle by comparing the current debt of the United States as a percentage of GNP with debt in the past, and found that the percentages were not remarkably different. Secretary Don Regan argues that it's cheaper to borrow from corporate flow than to reduce the deficit by taxes.

At this point some words by Thomas Jefferson become a moral imperative. Let me quote him. "The question whether one generation has the right to bind another by the deficit it imposes is a question of such consequence as to place it among the fundamental principles of any government. We should consider ourselves unauthorized to saddle posterity with our debts, and morally bound to pay them ourselves."

The first principle of government—the first responsibility each of us elected officials undertakes after the oath of office—is that you leave the next generation—our children—with opportunities for choice no less than our own.

That is why this nation has always been willing to fight to preserve its liberties. That is why we as a people put such a high value on environmental protection and the conservation of our natural resources. And it has become a fundamental issue in the budget process, because of the size of the deficits we face.

Spending a deficit is like having a credit card with the bill sent to your kids. Minnesota paid for its Vietnam bonus to Vietnam veterans with bonds thus sending the bill for the tragic political mistakes of our generation to our totally innocent children. Can we in good conscience use that plastic money to have life cushy now, knowing that our children will pay the carrying charge all of their lives? Do we have the right to limit their opportunities to choose, because we cannot limit out choices to what we can afford?

A fundamental issue. A moral imperative. An insoluable problem. Sounds like the spawning ground for a bipartisan presidential commission. MX, Social Security, Hunger, Central America, Lebanon. Perhaps I should retire from the partisan Senate, so that I can get in on the real action as a bipartisan presidential commissioner. And we now have a bipartisan group working on the deficit problem.

The true partisans, as opposed to the bipartisans, among us are tempted to go off in one of two directions. The anti-government partisans are tempted to get to the top of the hill by leaving some of us—the poor, the elderly, the farmer, small business—permanently behind.

They would go after the guts . . . and the heart . . . of government with massive cuts in pensions, education, child nutrition, health care, housing, farm assistance and rural electric cooperatives.

The pro-government partisans have a different agenda. They think we can get to the top of the hill—solve our budget dilemma—by repealing the tax legislation we passed in 1981. The problem with taxing our way to the top is that it would keep us permanently in the foothills of our economic potential by making government a continuously bigger slice of the national pie.

Some claim this is a question of fairness, rather than economics. Do we have a deficit because the 1981 tax cut gave the cupboard to the rich? Kemp-Roth was an across-the-board tax cut of 25 percent. Yes, the rich do get more dollars of tax relief from Kemp-

Roth, because they pay more dollars in taxes in the first place. But the structure of the tax code—the relationship of one bracket to another and its tax rate—remains the same.

And tax indexing—which hasn't taken effect yet—actually provides substantially more benefit to the lower than the higher brackets. At the lower end of the income scale the brackets are much narrower and the slope of the tax increase is much steeper. Indexing keeps the average and the lower-than-average wage earner from sliding up that slope with inflation. For the truly rich—those with incomes in six and seven figures—indexing is of no benefit at all. They will always pay 50 percent of their income in taxes whatever happens to the value of the dollar.

The American public is not one bit fooled about who is paying taxes and who isn't. Try to convince them that the tax code is fair. That the way to solve the deficit problem is to jack up the rates and leave the same old system in place. They are ready to junk the current system altogther and go to a consumption tax or a flat tax—anything to get a fresh start on the fairness problem.

In 1981, we did only one-third of tax reform. We brought down the rates and froze them with indexing. It was our hope that the pressure to balance the budget would force us to do the other half, to broaden the base by closing the loopholes—by repealing the credits, deductions and exemptions that provide no public benefit.

Base broadening remains the best hope to make progress on the tax side of the budget problem in the short term. If we can do that then—with the help of states—we can do the final one-third of reform. We can move to stop the debilitating increases in taxes on employing people in America.

What will we see when we get to the top of the hill—what is America's mission for the rest of this decade and beyond? I am tempted to give you my own vision of our future—if I did I'd talk to you about three gaps that we need to close.

One is the gender gap. Not just the political problem for Republicans facing women at the polls. But the economic gap that women face in the workplace and within our legal system. Child support, pensions, insurance, comparable worth. It will be expensive for our society to end economic discrimination against women. But it is a cost we must bear, because the flipside of those costs is the economic burden that women have borne too long.

Second, I would speak to you of the trade gap. Last year the value of U.S. imports exceeded the value of exports by $70 billion. It cost as much as two million new jobs in the U.S. Part of the problem is temporary and will be cured as we bring interest rates—and the value of the dollar—downward.

Third, the negotiating gap. How long will the gap between the last session of INF or START and the next go on? We need to get back to the table and a new vision of arms control will be necessary to get us there.

But rather than give you my agenda, let me talk about how the nation gets a vision of its future. Politicians can go to the top one at a time and come back with reports about what they saw. But how do we get the nation as a whole moving down the track to the top and down the other side of the mountain?

Consider how we got all these programs—the legacy of visions past—that we dare not cut. They came in the first instance, from our view of ourselves as a nation and as citizens. We are a country of doers. When we see a problem—in health care or education or environmental protection—we do not sit back and let someone else worry about it. We go out and invent a solution for ourselves. We organize some association of persons—and we work together to find a solution.

But America is one great community. If the problem is solved at home, we also want it solved down the block, in the next town, and down in Mississippi. We judge our nation, and judge ourselves that way. Minnesotans take great pride in the fact that we are so often our front on the solutions. People are so often following our example.

And then a Congressman or a Senator will catch on to the idea and will go out to Washington and advocate that the whole nation have this solution. Quite often the whole nation doesn't have the problem. So there's not much interest initially. And the problem gets redefined some. We attack the main issue and several that are closely related. Soon there is a caucus or coalition of members who have a stake in the solution. And when the problem is defined broadly enough—enough Congressional districts are cut in on the solution with something for everybody—you get a majority. Then you can get a bill passed. Get a program underway.

What happens next? A bureaucracy builds and an interest group grows up around the program. They develop a stake in seeing it continue. Even if the program is successful—even if it completely eradicates the original problem—the interest groups will hang on because the program is their reason for being. In good time you add a little bit, sweeten the pot. But you can't ever cut back, because the first rule of government in this kind of world is never do any direct harm. That's how we got 1100 programs of assistance and an American Public that doesn't want anything cut back.

Americans have always been that way. The first program to build a federal road for the benefit of a few was passed in the early 1800's. During the Pierce administration, Congress passed the first grant program to assist the indignant insane. Pierce vetoed it. But Congress came back with the Morill Act to support agricultural education, which Lincoln sighed during the Civil War, and we've been on that path for our entire history.

Americans have always organized interest groups—associations—to promote their interests. And they have always petitioned government for programs that serve those interests. And for our whole history, Congress has been responsive. The men and women who serve in Congress today are not less inclined toward the public interest nor more inclined toward the special interests. They have no less spine than the stalwarts of the 19th century. Perhaps more. They work harder at it. They are better informed. They have more experience in other facets of life. They would, I am sure—each and every one—vote the Jefferson quote I gave earlier as the law of the land tomorrow, if it were possible.

But there is a new element which has greatly changed the balance between the demand for government action by the public organized as special interests and willingness of the government to respond with a program of spending or a tax break. It is an institutional change. It is the decline of the political party and the rise of the interest group.

Come with me to a meeting of the Senate Finance Committee when we're doing tax reform. There are five hundred pairs of Gucci-shoed lobbyists jamming the hallway listening on the PA systems to their loopholes being discussed. I was in Kansas on Saturday and heard Senator Nancy Kassebaum talk about the bipartisan commission I mentioned earlier as follows: "If (commissions) become a way of doing business, we will have undermined the basis of our government. We will have erected one more barrier between elected officials and those who elected them." Why the need for bipartisan commissions for legislative progress? Because political party members make more hay by being against something than standing for something. The 1981 effort to save social security by legislative reform was killed off by democratic efforts to make their party candidates against anyone who reformed social security. So we waited until after the election and did the same thing with a commission.

Part of it is that the public no longer identifies closely with the political party and few indentify at all. So the politician has little to fear by deviating from the party line.

Ronald Reagan wants the MX missile. Dave Durenberger doesn't. Dave Durenberger wants tax indexing. Rudy Boschwitz doesn't. Rudy Boschwitz wants a dairy program that pays farmers not to produce. Paula Hawkins does not. Paula Hawkins wants a drug czar. Mark Hatfield does not. Mark Hartfield wants to acquire land for parks. Ronald Reagan does not. And you ask, does it mean anything that all of these are Republicans? What does the party stand for? So what does a Republican voter get for their efforts besides confusion? Or a Democrat? Which of you elected Democrats would like to run for the U.S. Senate on all of the Mondale promises—or on the total of all the Democratic candidate promises? You cannot and you will not. Mark Dayton tried it and he has a 7½ million dollar headache for trying.

Try to sell domestic auto content and trade protectionism while you are building a forty story monument in this town to a U.S. commitment to fair international competition and free trade. The public knows you cannot have it both ways.

Is the 12 billion dollar a year in newly-borrowed federal money for elementary and secondary education any more certain a cure for your headache in trying to improve the quality and affordability of U.S. education than enabling all those kids to pray for it each day in school.

What we see here is no more a party philosophy in platform than the platforms of the 1968-74 Democratic party which used the so-called rights of a few to destroy what had been a majority party in America—and took some good American politicians like Hubert Humphrey down with it. The point is that we do not get to the top of the hill without the American public. Those of us in politics can make it on one or two planks we find popular in our districts. Or as John Naisbett says in Megatrends, "by finding popular single issue interest parades to sign onto as grand marshal."

But what of the rest of the people in this room—the county commissioner, city council, town board, school board members and the people? How do they get a platform broad enough for all the good America needs to accomplish? And how do they get it in advance of an election rather than the millions of pieces of postal patron paid promises and political puffery they get in their mailboxes after the election—when it is too late? What do the Democrats want? Who do you hold accountable when the deficit is $200 billion?

Every politician has a plan to solve the budget problem. But no two are alike. And there is no longer an instrument to force consensus. There was a time when a Republican was necessarily an abolitionist. And another time when a Democrat was necessarily a New Dealer. Visions and missions for the nation put forward by a political party and shared by a nation. But the role of the party as mediator between interests at the top of the pyramid has been lost. And you as a citizen are left with no instrument—no institution—that can make it stick in the name of the public's interest. Do you think it would be possible for either party today to adopt a detailed platform on how to balance the budget? It would be denounced in all of its specifics the very next morning. And first and most loudly by the elected officials of that party, trying to separate themselves from the planks not popular in their districts.

Over the last decade Congress has attempted four major domestic reforms. The budget process is one. It lies in shambles. The first session adjourned without the capacity to act on even token reconciliation instructions required by the budget process. The second was regulatory reform. All but dead. The third is sometimes called New Federalism. It has been attempted by every president since Eisenhower. Ronald Reagan gave up on it, even before the legislative package was delivered to the Hill. The fourth is tax reform—where perhaps a little life remains. We brought down the rates. But can we broaden the base? We have a $200 billion headache for trying.

These reforms deal with the heart of government. Taxing. Spending. Regulating. Who does what in a federal system? None successful. They are needed because the American people have come to see the federal government as the government, not as our government. It is no longer the faithful servant of our interests to be trusted with our ideals. And there is no instrument within our reach that we can take hold of and use to turn the problem around. At times in our history the political party has served that function. It needs to again. We need to start by taking sides, by each of us making one party our party again and by demanding that its members look at the platform of that party as an opportunity, as a trust and as a discipline. An opportunity to build from the grassroots a budget process, regulatory reform, new federalism, tax reform, pension reform, health care, long term care, housing, social service and public assistance. Then, when we get to the top of the hill, as we think we can, we will then have an instrument at the ready that cannot only see ahead, but move us ahead to the challenges and opportunities of tomorrow.

This you may think a curious comment on the State of the Union in 1984. But the plain fact is that we are more divided than ever before. We have to build the solution from the bottom up. Take it as our problem and find an instrument to achieve our definition of the solution. That instrument exists. It has always served and served us best in the most difficult of times. It is the political party. This once great state has two that are unique in their hyphenated roots—the DFL and the I-R. And when they stood for something they were great parties with national leaders and marched in the forefront of state and national progress.

It your responsibility in 1984 and beyond to adopt one of these parties and insist that it do the job it can to protect your interest—our general interest as citizens—from the chaos of continuing budget deficits and the unconscionable burden on our children of debt.

AMERICA MUST RETURN TO THE TWO-PARTY SYSTEM

Mr. DURENBERGER. In that particular speech, Mr. President, I went back to the November speech and the reference to the fact that you are not going to turn this country around unless you have a compass that tells you where it is going to be headed, because nobody is going to let you turn it around unless they know where you are going.

In this particular set of comments, I reflected on the optimism that a lot of us feel and as the President reflected so well in his State of the Union Message about the fact that people in this country are feeling better about themselves and about the general direction they are headed, but I also observed that the reason we feel better is that we are sort of like the little train going up the side of the mountain that we can all remember from when we were kids, the story about the little engine chugging up the side of the hill saying, "I think I can, I think I can, I think I can."

Really, that is what the American people are saying right now, "I think I can get there, I think I can get there, I feel better about inflation, unemployment, and all those things that are bothering me."

I then went on to observe that we will be sold during the course of this year a substantial dose of "You can't make it to the top of the hill on a $200 billion deficit," and that again we are searching in this country for some direction; that we did get that direction from the President; we got good feelings from the President, but we did not get that direction.

I concluded by making the argument, as I have observed and my colleagues here, that every one of us who has been elected, whether as a Republican or Democrat, can all go to the top of the hill and look out and see what is on the other side, but when we come back down from that hill each one of us will have a different version of what we saw and how we are going to get there once we get to the top. And if every one of us was asked, "How would you balance the budget?" you would have 535 different answers depending on what we saw and what kind of a constituency we were postured over. I came to the conclusion—and this is one I feel quite strongly about—that the only way the American people are going to be able to tackle the problem of deficits and changing the role of Government is if we get back to the two-party system in America. Neither of our parties stand for anything today so they cannot be used as leverage on the 535 Republicans and Democrats that represent this constituency.

I pleaded with the county commissioners in my State, as I have pleaded with township officers and with League of Women Voters and with anyone else who will listen, the plain fact today is that this Union is more divided than it ever has been before. The only way to build a solution to our problems is from the bottom up, for everyone in this country to take the problem as their own, find an instrument to achieve a definition of the solution. I argued that instrument exists in America; it is the political party, and that the sooner people start taking sides on one side or the other, join a party and make it their party and make a stand for the public general good of this country rather than the special interests that plague this place and shapes the futures of the 535 people, the better off we will be.

ACID RAIN

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, my subject this morning is acid rain. The American public is surprisingly well-informed on the subject of acid rain, the causes of the problem, and the resources at stake.

Across the country a solid majority supports a control program now. And in the States of New England and in the Great Lakes region where sensitive resources are threatened, the desire for a control program goes beyond support to deep commitment. A commitment to get an acid rain control program adopted by this Congress.

But there are some who do not share this view. As Bill Ruckelshaus has learned, acid rain is a regional issue with explosive potential. The pollution occurs in one region; the environmental damage in another. The benefit of cleanup accrues to one region; the cost of controls falls on another. Some regions—and some States within regions—have made commendable efforts to improve air quality. Other States and regions have done virtually nothing.

At conferences in those States great comfort is taken by reciting what we do not know about acid rain.

We do not have precise measures of acid deposition—wet and dry—or trend lines stretching back over decades.

We do not know the atmospheric chemistry that converts sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides into sulfuric and nitric acids.

We do not know how these acids are buffered by elements in the soil.

How acidity reaching freshwater interferes with the respiration and reproduction of aquatic life.

If the damage to our forest and croplands is cumulative and permanent.

Whether emissions reductions at one point will increase rain ph at another.

That litany is being recited with telling affect at conferences across the Nation. I have even heard the governmental affairs vice president of one of our largest corporations say that sulfur and nitrogen are nutrients. That we spend millions every year spreading nitrogen on croplands. So why should we spend millions more taking it out of the air?

We know the bottom line on this argument. Wait for the science. Speed up the research, but wait for more information before requiring controls. I hear that line of reasoning, and I ask: What difference would it make if we had precise answers to all those questions? Do we need to know the precise chain of chemical, physical, and biological processes that carry a ton of sulfur from a powerplant in Ohio to a lake in New York, to know that action is needed now? I do not think so.

We know that the atmosphere over our continent is loaded with millions of tons of sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides each year.

We know that the largest share of that loading—90 percent in the case of SO^2—is caused by man and his industrial activities. It is manmade pollution.

We know that sulfur dioxide as an air pollutant can produce negative effects in the young and those with respiratory diseases. We control it as a conventional pollutant under the Clean Air Act.

We know that sulfur dioxide is converted to sulfates that reduce visibility across the eastern half of our continent—and across magnificent vistas of the West.

We know that acid deposition damages buildings, crops, and forests directly.

That waters acidified by the deposition of air pollutants mobilize heavy metals carrying them to sensitive environmental resources and into the food chain.

We know where the pollution comes from. A very large share of the sulfur dioxide comes from stationary sources you can point to on a map.

We know how to reduce emissions. The technology is not a problem. It is here now and it is very effective in removing large percentages of the pollutants before they reach the atmosphere.

We know enough today to save the lakes alive—fish, forests, crops, jobs, and people. It is time to sweeten the rain.

Several acid deposition control bills are pending before the Congress. Mitchell, Stafford, Waxman/Sikorski, Glenn and a bill of my own.

Whichever of these bills becomes law, the end result will be the same. The physical result will be the installation of sulfur dioxide control strategies at powerplants in the Midwest to reduce emissions by 8 to 12 million tons annually. They do not differ much in the results they would produce. But differ greatly as to means.

The bills by Senators STAFFORD and MITCHELL are very similar. They would allocate reduction requirements among 31 States east of the Mississippi. Each State would achieve their reductions by amending their State implementation plans required by the Clean Air Act. There would be no financial assistance for the specific plants required to make reductions.

Congressmen SIKORSKI and WAXMAN have introduced a bill that would mandate scrubbers at the 50 largest powerplants, allocate additional reductions among the 31 States beyond that level and provide financial assistance from an electricity tax. Their bill would also set new standards for nitrogen oxide emissions from trucks.

Last week, Senator GLENN introduced his own bill. It also uses an electricity tax to finance the control programs. The Glenn tax is three times larger than that imposed by Congressman SIKORSKI's bill. Rather than allocate reductions by a formula, Senator GLENN would impose a uniform cap on SO^2 emissions across the 31 States at 1.5 pounds per million Btu's.

My own bill would work much like Superfund, the program to clean up hazardous waste dumps. EPA would establish a national priority list of sources to be controlled and would provide financial assistance for the owners of the facilities. The grants for cleanup would come from a tax on emissions of sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide from both mobile and stationary sources. The tax would raise $40 billion over 10 years and the bill would require a net 10 million to reduction of SO^2 emissions in the Eastern United States. After 1993, emissions would be frozen at approximately 16 million tons nationwide by requiring an offset for all emissions from new sources.

Four very different control programs. Do the means make a difference when the practical result in each case would be very much the same? Yes; but the important thing to keep in mind is the commitment we share. The commitment to get an adequate acid rain control program underway as soon as possible. It is in some sense a luxury to be able to debate the means, rather than define and defend the goal as we had to do 3 and 4 years ago. That the debate has shifted from whether we need an acid rain control program, to what kind of program we are going to have, is a sign of progress.

In that spirit, let me just simply state what I see to be the particular virtues of my bill.

The first is least cost. My bill makes an explicit attempt to maximize emissions reductions achieved for each dollar that we invest. An adequate acid rain control program will be very expensive. If we stray far from the least cost approach, we will either spend very much more than we have to, or realize much less benefit than we could.

I think that the least cost principle requires that we take a national approach—that we not use States or control technologies as the unit of analysis. We ought to look at all the major sources in the Eastern half of the United States—and some in the Plains States as well; determine what particular control strategy is most effective per dollar invested for each; and then rank order them top to bottom according to which investments will maximize emissions reductions for each dollar spent.

My bill instructs the Administrator of EPA to do exactly that as a first step in writing a priority list. As a second step, the list is adjusted to account for source-receptor relationships where known. We would take powerplants on the east coast of Florida off the list and add others from the Ohio Valley to the extent that the science demonstrated a clear linkage between the sources' emissions and deposition at a sensitive site. I think that a priority listing of this kind is the only way that we can guarantee the least cost—and the maximum benefit—from an acid rain control program.

Bills using mandated technology, allocating reductions among States or capping States at uniform emissions levels do not produce a least-cost solution. Senator GLENN's bill, for instance, includes a flat prohibition on fuel switching as a control strategy. That is very good for Ohio coalminers and we do have to take job dislocation into account in order to pass a bill. But that does not mean that every miner currently digging high-sulfur coal should be guaranteed the right to keep digging it indefinitely.

The second virtue is equity. Equity among consumers under the least cost approach requires that any acid rain control program include a financing mechanism. The Mitchell and Stafford bills do not spread the cost. Congressman SIKORSKI, Senator GLENN, and my own bill all spread the cost, but in very different ways.

Least cost does not produce an equal percentage reduction or average in every State of the Union and certainly not at every plant within each State. Some plants—I expect about 150 to achieve a 10-million ton reduction—will be subject to control requirements. The rest will not.

But that does not mean the plants escaping controls are not contributing to the acid rain problem. They may emit less or at a lesser rate, but the SO^2, even from low sulfur coal, even when scrubbed, does damage when deposited on a sensitive resource. Consumers receiving power from a plant or system which is not targeted for controls under the program should not escape their share of the responsibility simply because their plant is too small or too old or too difficult to retrofit.

The fundamental equity problem is this: How to give credit for what has already been done. Said another way, we should not penalize those in States like Minnesota who had the foresight to take the lead in attacking the Nation's air quality problems—or they will never do it again.

Minnesotans have invested $300 million in scrubbers and are paying a premium to use low-sulfur coal each day. We are willing to pay a tax according to our continuing contribution to the problem, but we want it known that we have done a large part of our share already. And we want it known to us through tax assessments lower than those in States or on utility systems where no reductions have been made. That led me to design a financing mechanism based on an emission tax, rather than a tax on electricity consumption.

Let me tell you about Senator GLENN's bill to demonstrate the magnitude of this issue. Senator GLENN's electricity tax is not particularly hard on Minnesota. It is only on fossile fuel plants and we have a high percentage of nuclear power. Senator GLENN would exempt plants meeting the new source performance standards, and most of our large sources do.

Nevertheless, and according to a study by the Congressional Budget Office to be released next week, the Glenn electricity tax at 3 mils per kilowatt hour would cost Minnesotans $177 million more than an emission tax designed to raise the same amount of revenue nationwide. We would pay a much smaller percentage of the national emission tax, because we have done much to reduce our emissions. When Vice President MONDALE attacked the electricity tax in New Hampshire—and argued that the polluters should pay more—he was remembering his Minnesota roots.

Beyond fairness, there are other advantages in an emissions as compared to an electricity tax. An emissions tax creates marketplace incentives to reduce pollution and avoid the tax. Even without grants, EPA estimates that a modest tax on sulfur dioxide would produce near term—not 1993, but now—low-cost and no-cost reductions of 1 to 2 million tons each year. Polluters would simply make these reductions to avoid paying the tax because it would be cheaper. An electricity tax provides no such incentive.

And an emissions tax can be used to spread the cost beyond electric powerplants and their customers to other industrial and mobile sources who contribute to the acid rain problem. Why should electric consumers pay the whole cost of cleanup when they are only 60 percent of the pollution problem?

It will be argued that an electricity tax is necessary to spread more of the cost out of the Ohio Valley. Well, I would argue that a pure and complete emissions tax—including a tax on nitrogen oxide emissions from cars and trucks—would have the same practical effect. It shields Ohio electric consumers to the same degree, but does so by spreading the burden to all polluters according to their contribution to the problem, rather than to all electric consumers nationwide.

So we are back to the politics of acid rain and what is likely to happen in the Congress. Viewed from an environmental perspective each of the bills under consideration produce similar results. But by methods quite different.

The Senate Environment and Public Works Committee will begin hearings on February 2. I expect it will report a bill along the Mitchell/Stafford lines. The committee is primarily Northeastern or Western and a tax is opposed in both regions. But I do not think that bill can be scheduled for debate on the floor of the Senate because it loads the whole cost on a few States.

In the House an electricity tax looks pretty good. The votes are in the Midwest. Waxman/Sikorski has an impressive number of cosponsors.

But will the two ever meet on the way to the President's desk? I think not. The West will never agree to an electricity tax—they do not have the evidence of damage as we do in our part of the country or in New England. Up to now acid rain has been a safe environmental vote for the West. But it becomes expensive with an electricity tax—in fact, per kilowatt hour Wyoming would bear the same burden as Ohio.

Put a tax on them and you soon discover that the States west of the Mississippi are 40 percent of the Senate. Just as the Midwest is 40 percent of the House.

I have always thought an emissions tax the only fair thing to do. In this case, I think the fair thing may also be the only thing politically possible. Which is the third virtue I would claim for my bill. When you run out all the numbers, you find that the emissions-tax/least cost approach in my bill has results halfway between Mitchell/Stafford and Waxman/Sikorski for most States. Looked at solely from a cost perspective and State-by-State, my bill is in between the most likely House and Senate bills for the vast majority of States. If everyone will go halfway to solve the national problem of acid rain, an emissions tax is the most likely vehicle for compromise.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DURENBERGER. I thank the Chair.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SASSER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I might inquire if provision has been made for me to have the remainder of the minority leader's time this morning?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct; such provision has been made.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the Chair.

REPORT ON HONDURAS

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, this past weekend I journeyed to Honduras to undertake a mission which encompassed a comprehensive review of the existing infrastructure which has been built by the U.S. military in that country. I went beyond this task and sought to achieve an understanding of what our military contemplates in the way of future construction-related activities which might be undertaken in Honduras.

Mr. President, I am now reporting to the Senate that the United States has embarked on a substantial buildup of permanent and semipermanent facilities which could be utilized to support contingency operations in Central America.

As the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Military Construction Appropriations, I have been concerned that the full inventory of our military activities has not been explained to the American people. Indeed, they have not even been told that such an inventory exists. It was precisely for this reason that last year I inserted language in the Military Construction Act which put a freeze on an airfield construction program in the key north coast city of La Cieba. The language prevented any spending on the project until the Committees on Appropriations have been notified as to the complete U.S. construction plan for the region.

The purpose of this report was to obtain in one document a complete overview of what has been built, from whatever funding source, should it be from the military construction budget, from funds provided for operations and maintenance in the Department of Defense, or other sources. In addition, this report would have placed before the Congress a complete listing of any future construction in support of U.S. military activities.

Mr. President, this requirement was not vetoed by the President; he did not find it unreasonable. By Presidential action this requirement became the law of the land as a integral part of the Military Construction Act for fiscal year 1984, Public Law 98-116.

Mr. President, it has been 4 months since the law required that this accounting be submitted to the Congress. Regretfully, I must inform the Senate that the Committees on Appropriation have not yet received that report. Before going to Honduras I asked officials in the Department of Defense when we could expect that report. Their response was not heartening. They said the report could not be submitted until June, which as we all know, is well after the time the Committees on Appropriations must complete our markup of the fiscal year 1985 budget request.

Consequently, as it became apparent to me that the requirements of the law were not being met, I decided to make this trip to measure the dimensions of American military involvement in Honduras.

Mr. President, to this day, the Military Construction Subcommittee has approved only two sites for funding for enhancement of military facilities in Honduras. During my visit I learned that four additional airfields which are capable of handling large military transport aircraft have been built or improved during the Big Pine I and Big Pine II exercises. Further, I learned that the next exercise, to be held in May, will encompass construction of at least two and perhaps three additional airstrips which are capable of landing these transport planes. In addition, yet another military exercise to be conducted late this year may result in even more airfield construction. These new airfields are being built not out of money provided for military construction by the Congress, but out of operation and maintenance funds approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff for war games in the region. In support of the many airfields, which have been constructed, I found two operational radar sites in southern Honduras near the borders of Nicaragua and El Salvador.

Mr. President, I will detail a complete listing of U.S. construction activities for military facilities in Honduras later in this speech.

Mr. President, it distresses me to report that the regional military buildup is not confined to Honduras. During my visit I made two brief stops at the U.S. Navy base in Key West, Fla. I learned that this facility is undergoing a substantial upgrade to prepare for future contingency requirements. These include the expansion of ordnance warehousing for the U.S. Air Force and Navy, as well as docking and refueling facilities for the Navy. I am requesting from the naval facilities engineering command a complete documentation of the construction underway or planned for the Key West facility.

All in all, Mr. President, what I found is a sustained and rapid buildup of military facilities in the region, the purpose of which has not been made clear to the Congress or the American people. It is my firm belief that before the administration is allowed to continue this military buildup, a full and open debate must be held on this issue.

If we do not insist on a detailed explanation, we shall continue to see what is in truth nothing less than a backdoor military buildup in Honduras, a military buildup which far exceeds what is necessary for the successful completion of military exercises. The American people deserve a full and complete accounting of what our military objectives are in Honduras.

The military infrastructure buildup in Honduras, if continued apace could threaten to entangle our country in yet another foreign military involvement for which no clear mission has been defined and whose objectives have been obscured by the policymakers of this country.

Mr. President, the stated purpose of these military exercises in Honduras has been the training of U.S. Forces. But the exercises which have taken place have been of unusually long duration and have resulted in construction of military facilities beyond what could reasonably be expected or justified as necessary for the conduct of war games alone. This was underscored by the fact that while in Honduras I was told by high ranking U.S. officials that another reason for the exercises has been and remains to bring pressure against the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. I should note that this pressure is not designed to meet a threat of invasion by Nicaragua. In point of fact not one official of the United States even suggested that an invasion of Honduras by Nicaragua is to occur. To quote one senior official, "the threat is not an invasion by Nicaragua but an insurgency in Honduras."

Mr. President, I would suggest that we do not deal with subversion or insurgency by building a large military infrastructure. Airfields and base camps and radar sites and naval facilities are more suited to conventional conflict rather than an insurgency arising from the discontent of the impoverished or from the implacement of terrorists from another country. Subversion is not stopped by constructing airfields and preparing for war. Subversion will be halted only when the seeds of social and economic discontent are no longer allowed to grow. Weapons and a military buildup are not the solution to the social and economic problems of Honduras and Central America. In fact, it was the observation of many Hondurans and the Ambassadors of Contadora countries with whom I visited that military aid will only extend conflict, increase the tensions and make a peaceful solution more difficult to achieve.

Mr. President, Honduras is a poor country; 60 percent of the people of Honduras are either out of work or have unproductive jobs which do not provide sufficient income to meet the basic needs of their families. Per capita income is the lowest in the region, barely $600 a year. The social and economic budget of the Government of Honduras has already been cut back and funds for existing programs have been diverted to pay for the military activity in that country. This, despite the fact that the United States already funds one-third of the Honduran defense expenditures for the military assistance program and provides vast amounts of indirect support through the exercises and infrastructure I will shortly outline to the Senate.

Many Honduran families believe and told me directly that a war on social and economic problems in Honduras would have a much greater impact on reducing the threat of subversion, whether internal or external, than would a massive buildup of military facilities and armaments. Many Hondurans and many Americans, I might add, fear that with military priorities overshadowing domestic priorities the risk of internal unrest and external subversion will inevitably increase.

But, Mr. President, in Honduras military projects do take precedence over domestic needs. Tragic as it is, that remains the essential fact of life in Honduras today. Honduras, where once democracy was beginning to flourish, is becoming an armed camp.

The peace process, particularly that encouraged by the four Contadora countries, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, and Columbia, is moving slowly. And all the while the arms buildup accelerates and we find a growing threat of permanent foreign military installations which could lead to military adventures beyond our control.

Mr. President, I will now list for the record several locations in Honduras where U.S. military personnel have constructed or plan to construct military facilities.

First, at Palmerola near Comuyagua, this is the location of the headquarters of joint task force, Alpha, which will serve as the command and control and communications port for the next planned exercise, Grenadaro I. This location also served as the headquarters for the Big Pine II exercise during 1983. Presently at Palmerola exist sophisticated communications equipment, 160 wooden tropical huts, a temporary medical facility, and other base support facilities. Palmerola is the location of a $13 million military construction project approved by Congress to lengthen an existing hard surface runway, provide 50,000 barrels of jet fuel storage, provide a lighting system making Palmerola the only lighted runway in Honduras and other construction. This construction began in April of last year. It is presently almost 60 percent complete and the project will be finished in mid-July. Once completed, the Palmerola Airport will be capable of accommodating any aircraft in the U.S. military arsenal, including the large C-5A transport airplanes.

During my visit to Palmerola I learned that the temporary medical facilities, currently in use, will soon be redeployed back to the United States. Military officials expressed concern that new medical facilities must be made available prior to the conduct of the next exercise, Grenadaro I, in May. Presently under discussion with the Government of Honduras is a proposal by the U.S. military southern command to construct a combat support hospital at Palmerola. This hospital will consist of a permanent concrete block, tin roof core facility for an operating room, pharmacy, and other necessary medical facilities. I would underscore that this is a combat support hospital. In addition, some 15 wooden tropical huts will be built to house a minimum of 80 hospital beds. As I indicated, discussions are underway with the Government of Honduras to build this facility. U.S. Army officials indicated that there are no plans at the present for U.S. participation in this construction project. But these officials cautioned that such a facility must be provided for the U.S. contingent to be deployed in Grenadaro I in the latter part of May.

Palmerola is also the location for an ammunition storage facility requested by the Reagan administration for fiscal year 1985. This facility would cost $1.5 million and will consist of the reinforced concrete foundation, steel arched igloos with earthen covers. The purpose of this facility is to preposition in Honduras munitions and ordnance such as iron bombs and rockets for the U.S. Air Force's sophisticated bombers and fighters. The justification for this facility made available to the committee indicates that it "is required to enhance capabilities to execute tactical air contingency operations in support of allies in the region."

Also at Palmerola is proposed a $4.3 million military construction project in the fiscal year 1985 budget request. This project will provide almost 19,000 square feet of barracks space for 100 U.S. Army personnel. In addition, this project will provide for other construction, including an aircraft maintenance hangar.

These fiscal year 1985 projects which have been requested, particularly the Air Force ammunition storage facility, represent a significant departure in U.S. policy in Honduras, for with this project the U.S. will be prepositioning military ordnance in Honduras. Congress must be very careful before approving such a project.

At San Lorenzo, in southern Honduras, near the Nicaraguan border, U.S. Army engineers have built a 3,000 foot, hard-packed dirt runway capable of accommodating U.S. Air Force C-130 transport airplanes. This airfield, according to the combat engineer in Honduras, can be expected to last and remain operational for several years and will require little or no maintenance during the dry season and only moderate maintenance during the rainy season in order to remain operational.

Also at San Lorenzo, the U.S. Army has built 94 wooden tropical huts to house the U.S. troops during Big Pine II.

While I was there, they were housing a battalion headquarters and company of combat engineers. The San Lorenzo base camp consists of a dining facility, a small PX has been constructed, and other administrative and support buildings. It was stated by the engineers present at that location that these facilities could last for at least 2 years with minimal maintenance and the usable life could be extended for many, many years if properly maintained.

The U.S. Engineers who participated in the Big Pine II exercises also constructed 13 miles of tank traps, 12 feet wide and four-and-a-half feet deep south of San Lorenzo and only a few miles from the Nicaraguan border.

Near the San Lorenzo airstrip and base camp is an existing Honduran Deepwater Port facility. During my visit this past weekend a U.S. Navy transport vessel was docked at the pier to begin the redeployment back to the United States of the engineering battalion which participated in the Big Pine II exercises. U.S. officials were unclear as to the future use of San Lorenzo, although it was indicated that the base camp facilities might be turned over to a Honduran infantry unit presently deployed on an adjacent site. In addition, it was stated that the transport capable airfield might be utilized in future training exercises.

Prior to leaving for Honduras I learned that the administration is requesting $2.9 million for another military construction project to be constructed near San Lorenzo. This project is a pre-stop point for the U.S. Army. This project will consist of a 35,000 square foot warehouse, an ammunition and demolition storage area, and a 100,000 gallon fuel storage tank. This project is similar to the prepositioned munitions storage project which has been proposed by the administration for Palmerola. This project, in my opinion, should be closely scrutinized by the appropriate committees of Congress.

Aguacate is located in eastern Honduras. There a U.S. engineer battalion has extended a 4,300 foot dirt strip to 8,000 feet. This location was utilized extensively during 1983 in support of the Big Pine II exercise. It was stated by U.S. officials that Aguacate will possibly be used in Grenadaro I as well. During my visit to Aguacate I was briefed that the Honduran military is considering a project to pave the 8,000 foot strip which would make this location capable of accommodating jet fighter and attack aircraft.

Moving on to La Cieba, which is on the Honduran north coast, this is the site of the second military construction project approved by Congress. However, Congress has directed by law that none of the funds for this project shall be obligated until the Appropriations Committees receive a complete report on military construction throughout the Central American region. This project will consist of an $8 million upgrade which will include 30,000 gallons of fuel storage and a parallel taxiway to accommodate swift U.S. fighter operations. Although no construction has yet taken place at La Cieba, U.S. military forces are presently utilizing the existing runway.

During my visit I learned that two new airfields will be constructed during the Grenadaro I exercises. The first is located in Cucuyagua in western Honduras, a few miles from the Salvadoran border. This will be the site of the headquarters operations of the next military war game. The airfield, which will be constructed, will be similar to that which was built at San Lorenzo. It will be a 3,000-foot, hard-packed dirt runway capable of accepting C-130 transport airplanes and capable of enduring for many years with proper maintenance.

Jamastran is the second airfield which will be constructed during Grenadaro I. This airfield will be located in southern Honduras near the Nicaraguan border.

In Trujillo, on the north coast, the U.S. Navy Seabees extended an existing hard surface runway and built an additional 500 feet to make this runway C-130 capable.

The Trujillo facility is close to the regional military training center where several Salvadoran and Honduran battalions have been trained since last summer. During my visit to the regional military training center, I learned that 10 additional battalions would be trained at the existing facility during calendar year 1984 by the American training cadre at that facility. Officials in the State Department have indicated that the administration is considering a fiscal year 1984 supplemental budget request for $25 million from the military assistance program to construct a permanent training center for future training requirements. I found the existing facilities, while austere, to be adequate for the training task which it has been assigned.

Last September the Department of Defense sent to the subcommittees on military construction a request to proceed with a million dollar design project for a proposed permanent port-airfield facility at Puerto Castilla. This proposal was withdrawn 3 weeks later. However, my staff has learned that a $50 million proposal for the fiscal year 1985 budget request had been included in earlier drafts of the President's budget submission to proceed with construction of this facility. The line item was struck from the budget in December during reviews at the level of the office of Secretary of Defense. The project which was proposed by the U.S. Southern Command consisted of $21.3 million for naval base improvements, $112.3 million to construct a hard surface runway and $24.5 million to build connecting roads. This project would cost $160 million.

During my discussions with U.S. military and State Department officials in Honduras I was assured that no final decision has been made on such a permanent U.S. naval facility in Honduras. The commander of the Honduran armed forces, General Alvarez, made it very clear during our discussions on Monday that it is the desire of the Honduran Government to encourage the United States to construct such a facility for joint United States-Honduran use. During my visit in Honduras, the Honduran President stated that his government is actively negotiating the installation of a North American air-naval base in Puerto Castilla.

Mr. President, I toured Puerto Castilla. I found already constructed by the Government of Honduras a 150-meter dock which was already being utilized by the U.S. Navy and Army during the Big Pine II exercises. This port facility, while built by the Honduran Government for civilian commerce can easily be shifted to military use. The existing 150-meter dock will soon be expanded to 450 meters. Already in existence are six 25,000-barrel fuel storage tanks and two 100- by 500-foot warehouses are under construction.

Mr. President, I oppose any kind of permanent U.S. facility in Honduras, such as has been proposed for Puerto Castilla by the southern command. The facility as envisioned by the southern command would station some 1,000 U.S. military personnel at that port. I think it would be a mistake to build such a facility during this period. The United States already has available the Key West naval base, which is being upgraded and improved for contingency operations and is less than 2 days steaming time to Honduras and only 2½ hours by subsonic aircraft from Honduras.

Furthermore, it was apparent to me that there is no need for the port facility in view of the existing docks and warehouses and fuel storage facilities I inspected at Puerto Castilla. In addition, there appears no justification for yet another long hard surface runway in Honduras.

So, Mr. President, I would hope that the Department of Defense will approach any negotiations with the Government of Honduras on a joint United States-Honduran naval base very carefully. I would urge the administration to turn down the proposal which has been made by the U.S. Military Southern Command Headquarters in Panama.

During my visit I also toured two operational radar sites in southern Honduras. One is at Tiger Island in the Gulf of Fronseca. The other is at Cerro La Mole, 20 miles south of Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras. The capabilities of these radars remain classified. They are manned by U.S. Marine Corps personnel and Air Force personnel of the United States. But I can say that U.S. Military officials indicated that the Cierro La Mole radar, high atop a 6,500-foot peak will become a permanent facility with the United States turning the site over to the government of Honduras sometime in 1986. The site at Tiger Island is manned by the U.S. Marine Corps personnel, as I stated earlier. Southern command officials indicated that the location of this particular radar system is currently under review.

Mr. President, I should mention three additional airfields which are available to the U.S. military. First, at Puerto Lempira on the eastern coast the United States made improvements to an existing runway facility to make it C-130 capable for the Big Pine I exercises held early last year. Second, the La Mesa Honduran Air Force Base at San Pedro Sula has been utilized substantially by U.S. military transports during the Big Pine II exercises although no construction has been made at this site. Three, the Toncontin Honduran Air Force Base, near the capital city, is also utilized by the U.S. military, no construction has been made at this site.

Mr. President, I do not want to speculate as to the intended use of these facilities. But such a massive buildup will allow substantial contingency operations in the region. I do not believe that the American people desire an increased U.S. miltary presence in a region of substantial military instability. Let us face it Central America is no Grenada. A defeat of either the guerrillas in El Salvador or the Sandinistas in Nicaragua will not be easily accomplished. There will be no 1-day wars in Central America. Should the United States get involved directly in a regional military conflict, the likelihood that our troops would be engaged in warfare for a sustained period of time is overwhelming.

The citizens of the United States desire no such conflict. The American people do not support a military solution to problems in Central America. Until all diplomatic and political options have been exhausted, we should not ask our people to take up arms. And we should not support activities which make it more likely that American arms will be employed in Central America.

But the facilities already constructed or planned for Honduras will make a war in the region easier to conduct. Such facilities could acutally serve to encourage Honduran military commanders to attempt a military solution to their diplomatic and political conflict with Nicaragua.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the next series of exercises, Grenadaro I, will be conducted beginning in May. These exercises will be conducted primarily at two sites. As I have earlier stated, one site is close to the Salvadoran border and the other is near the Nicaraguan border. These war games, so close to areas of military instability within El Salvador and Nicaragua, run a grave risk, in my opinion, of the accidental and unintentional involvement of our troops in a real shooting war.

A war in Central America must not be started by accident. Each new airfield, each new exercise, each new rocket or bomb we preposition in Honduras for U.S. fighters moves us closer to the probability of an accident or unintended act which could cause events to run beyond our control.

Already we have seen U.S. military personnel come under hostile fire. The presence of U.S. military personnel in exercises perilously close to the border area presents the greater fear that more Americans could find themselves involved in a border clash.

Mr. President, this is a serious topic. It is one I have not discussed lightly. It is a topic on which I devoted a great deal of thought and study and reflection. I have chosen my words carefully. I do not yet know where the administration seeks to go in Central America. But I have seen with my own eyes a military infrastructure that could accommodate any policy decision.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to go to Central America to review the facilities I have visited, to listen to the briefings, to raise their own questions, and to make an independent judgment on this matter.

As I have said in this Chamber on numerous occasions, we cannot permit the expansion of Soviet and Cuban influence in the region. That much is clear. But I believe that a too narrow focus on the conflict has caused us to ignore indigenous social and economic problems. Indeed, through a military preoccupation we may well be exacerbating them. And it is, after all, the social and economic problems which provide fertile ground for Marxist revolutions.

Mr. President, I look forward to a growing public debate on the issues that I have raised this morning. I believe that public debate is necessary. The American people must be fully informed to be fully supportive. And they must know what our policy is in Central America and what the mission of our military should be there. We have seen the grim and tragic results of backing into policies, such as that in Lebanon which has cost the lives of hundreds of young American men, with no clear purpose, no clear statement, no clear mission, no clear direction as to where we are going.

The policy option which is ultimately implemented in Central America has no chance of success without the full support of the American people.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I just wanted to take about 2 minutes to commend the Senator from Tennessee for the leadership and work that he has done to bring this to the light of the Senate.

I think it is clear that we have here, under the guise of military exercises in Central America, two things happening. First, we have the establishment of a permanent U.S. military presence of some significance in Honduras.

This morning, I asked the Secretary of the Air Force how many permanent Air Force personnel he expected to station in Honduras in 1985; he indicated 290. Last week, I asked Secretary Weinberger how many permanent military people we expected to have there and he indicated that his understanding was between 700 and 800. So we have a permanent military presence being established there.

We also have a permanent military infrastructure being constructed there; one that has generally not been authorized by the Congress. These action, in my opinion, cannot be justified on the basis that they are needed to accomplish military exercises. The justification which has been put forward is just simply inadequate.

As I see it, the difficulty with this course, and the difficulty with Congress letting this go forward without proper monitoring and proper policy decisions being made is, that if we have a long-range buildup of military presence in that region, it makes it virtually impossible for us to pursue the diplomatic options which may become available to reduce tensions there. I think that clearly what we have going on is a two-track situation, where SOUTHCOM has identified a source of action it is pursuing to increase our military presence. And that is going forward, regardless of any desire which may exist anywhere else in the administration to pursue a nonmilitary solution.

I think it is a subject of grave concern for the Congress and for the country. Again, I commend the Senator from Tennessee for the leadership he has shown in focusing our attention on this issue. I hope that we can give it the attention it deserves and can see to it that Congress plays its constitutional role in overseeing our military actions.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I yield to the majority leader.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUMPHREY). Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 12:30 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes.

NEEDED: LEGISLATION TO STOP U.S. NUCLEAR SALES TO CHINA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in the budget the President sent to the Congress on February 1, we are asked to spend tens of billions of dollars for the research, manufacturing, deployment, and development of delivery systems for nuclear weapons in fiscal 1985. The justification for this massive expenditure is to enhance our deterrence.

The just published nuclear weapons data book discloses that we are adding a net of three new nuclear weapons every day. I say "net" because our factories produce eight new nuclear weapons every day. They dismantle five old ones to provide plutonium and enriched uranium for the new weapons. The new weapons provide more power and greater accuracy. So we refine and expand our deterrent and make it more capable of surely delivering a retaliatory strike on the Soviet Union in the event we suffer a Soviet strike.

Unless and until we can achieve a mutual and verifiable agreement with the Soviet Union to stop the arms race, we will almost certainly continue to pursue this multibillion-dollar enhancement of a nuclear stockpile that already could devastate every conceivable target in the Soviet Union to kingdom come—even if they should launch the first preemptive strike.

Yes, deterrence has kept the uneasy superpower peace for more than 30 years while each superpower has had the capability of devastating the other. If Russia and the United States were the only two nuclear armed countries, this race might go on for another 30 or 50 or 100 years or more with human life continuing because of the balance of terror; that is, the grim absolute certainty that whatever superpower launched an attack would perish together with its adversary.

But Russia and the United States are not the only nations with nuclear arsenals. The nuclear club is growing. As it grows, the prospect of nuclear war progresses. That is why I speak out now. In a January 8 article in the Washington Post, Leonard Spector made a devastating case for much more tightly controlling our nuclear exports to China. Spector formerly served as chief counsel to the Senate Subcommittee on Nuclear Proliferation. He is now a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. He writes:

> Unfortunately if countries were rated according to what they had recently done to spread nuclear weapons, China would stand out as "Non-Profiliferation Enemy Number One."

Spector calls the Chinese tutelage of Pakistan in how to build nuclear weapons, if true, the "most willful act to promote proliferation of nuclear weapons by a nuclear power in 20 years." He also points out that China has provided nuclear materials to South Africa, Argentina, and India. How about the nuclear relations of this country to China? Spector says that the present administration has conditioned any nuclear cooperation with China on China tightening its nuclear export policies. But then the administration is also discussing waiving the requirements that China agree to inspection by the IAEA to verify that our nuclear exports to China are not being used to make weapons.

And Spector points out what we in the Congress could and should do about this. Specifically with China in mind, we could and should amend the Atomic Energy Act to require that any nuclear cooperation agreement does not go into effect without a joint congressional resolution that the President would have to sign. We could, as an alternative, insist that any agreement with China come before the Senate requiring a two-thirds approval.

Mr. President, our failure to act on this matter will be outrageous. We are not talking about an agreement with our long-term allies—the democracies of Canada or the United Kingdom—we are talking about Communist China, a Marxist despotism, as ruthless and revolutionary a tyranny as the Soviet Union itself, and a country that could be once again firmly allied with the Soviet Union against this country next year, next month, or tomorrow. For us to provide nuclear know-how or materials or equipment to China is as stupid and vicious as if the FBI furnished weapons to the criminal underground.

It is shameful for us to provide nuclear materials or equipment to any country anywhere that does not conform fully to the anti-proliferation treaty. But for us to provide nuclear capability to the biggest Communist country on the face of the Earth for any reason is insanity. Oh sure, the Chinese already have a rudimentary nuclear capability. It is only rudimentary because they do not have the kind of know-how we have and which we can—and unless we change our course will—provide them.

Why do the Chinese want to buy our nuclear exports? It is because they do not have materials and equipment and know-how to make their nuclear arsenal much more devastating. And, yes indeed, the Chinese at the moment threaten and oppose the Soviet Union. But that is at the moment, for the time being, temporarily. And even if these two Communist giants continue as enemies, a more powerful and lethal Chinese nuclear capability only increases the likelihood of nuclear war.

But worse, far worse, even than the danger of an ultimate Chinese and Russian military alliance against this country is the present, overt, and repeatedly demonstrated Chinese policy of strewing nuclear capability throughout the world. Nuclear proliferation represents far and away the most serious prospect of nuclear war. Stopping that proliferation should be our No. 1 foreign policy priority.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred by Leonard Spector be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 8, 1984]

MORE COUNTRIES WITH NUKES?

(By Leonard S. Spector)

When Chinese Prime Minister Zhao Ziyang visits Washington next week, opening nuclear trade with the United States will be near the top of his agenda. The issue poses a difficult challenge for the Reagan administration, which is eager to expand U.S. exports of nuclear technology, but also wants to look tough on the question of nuclear proliferation.

Unfortunately, if countries were rated according to what they had recently done to spread nuclear weapons, China would stand out as "Non-Proliferation Enemy Number One." According to press accounts quoting U.S. officials, China in 1982 taught Pakistan how to build atomic weapons by giving it key weapons design information. If true, this is surely the most willful act to promote proliferation by a nuclear power in more than 20 years.

Moreover, in 1982, China also reportedly sold enriched uranium to South Africa and heavy water to Argentina and India—sales that could help these nations achieve their apparent goal of acquiring nuclear weapons. These sales were made without even the most elementary controls to prevent diversion of those nuclear materials into weapons programs.

China has refused to participate in both the Nuclear Suppliers' Group and the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, two of the key international institutions intended to prevent proliferation. Only reluctantly did China join the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

To its credit, the Reagan administration explicitly conditioned any U.S. nuclear cooperation on Peking's tightening its nuclear export policies. State Department officials recently indicated that China has provided the necessary assurances that it would do so, and an agreement on Sino-American nuclear cooperation is now being drafted.

This is a step in the right direction. But crucial details about the duration and substance of Peking's assurances and how explicit these will be in the cooperation agreement—which is expected to have a 30-year term—have yet to be revealed. And the United States has apparently discussed waiving the basic non-proliferation principle that U.S. exports to China be subject to continuing inspection by the IAEA to verify that they are not being used to make weapons. The United States even imposes this requirement on Britain, which has its own nuclear weapons. The Reagan administration has not disclosed why it is considering this departure from traditional policy, or what alternative verification measures may be planned in the case of China.

The Reagan administration has been on the defensive in its dealings with Peking almost since it took office, trying to overcome the distrust created by candidate Reagan's criticism of earlier Sino-American rapprochement and by subsequent arms sales to Taiwan. The new agreement on nuclear cooperation is clearly part of a larger effort, which also includes loosened controls on U.S. military and high technology exports to China, to remove Peking's doubts about this administration.

The pressure to improve ties is reinforced by intense lobbying from U.S. corporations that make nuclear technology and want to sell it to China.

Secretary of State George P. Shultz apparently resisted these pressures in negotiating the basics of the nuclear cooperation agreement, but the incentive will remain to gloss over differences as the fine print is being drafted. Such corner-cutting could introduce weaknesses and ambiguities that could have a grave impact later, as illustrated by our current dispute with India over its authority under our 1963 nuclear accord to extract plutonium usable in weapons from spent nuclear fuel that originated in the United States.

The Atomic Energy Act gave Congress authority to ensure that the State Department negotiate ironclad restrictions on Chinese nuclear practices. The act said Congress could reject any nuclear agreement negotiated by State with a concurrent resolution passed by House and Senate. But the Supreme Court invalidated such "legislative vetoes" last June.

Congress could close this new legal loophole in time to guarantee the adequacy of the new Sino-American agreement and chasten U.S. negotiators in the process. It could amend the Atomic Energy Act to require that no nuclear cooperation agreement with a foreign country could go into effect unless endorsed beforehand by a joint resolution that the president would have to sign. Or Congress could insist that the Sino-American agreement be submitted to the Senate as a treaty requiring two-thirds approval.

It appears now that the Chinese nuclear accord, like too many of its predecessors, is being pursued in haste to achieve near-term foreign policy and commercial objectives, despite the major non-proliferation questions it raises. If Congress does not act quickly to restore its oversight functions, these questions may never receive the public scrutiny they urgently require.

THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION: LET US GET ON WITH IT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as we forge into the 2d session of the 98th Congress, we undoubtedly ask ourselves what issues will we resolve in the second session that we did not in the first? What have we been putting off for consideration at a later time?

Year after year, Mr. President, we put off consideration of the Genocide Convention. For decades, the Senate has side-stepped this critical issue. Specifically, 38 years have passed and we still have not ratified the Genocide Treaty, signed by President Truman and ratified by nearly 90 other nations.

The Genocide Convention is a noble cause. It guarantees to all groups, regardless of race, religion, nationality, or ethnic background, the right to live free from the specter of elimination. It assures that criminals, guilty of the most hateful crime known to man, will be tried and punished.

The United States prides itself on being a leading proponent of human rights; yet in the world's eyes, that image is tarnished until we approve the most important of human rights treaties.

Our failure to ratify also undermines our ability to criticize the Soviet Union for its systematic violation of human rights in Eastern bloc countries. We have handicapped ourselves diplomatically by refusing to acknowledge the importance of the Genocide Convention and its link to the fight for human rights.

Why should America be known as setting a double standard on human rights? Why should we give the Russians another excuse to use propaganda against us? Why do we insist on tossing away a valuable diplomatic tool?

Mr. President, if I knew the answer to these questions, I would not have risen almost daily since 1967 to urge my colleagues to ratify the Genocide Convention.

Until we give our advice and consent to this vital human rights treaty, the world realizes that the United States has failed to enter the fight for human rights without reservation. Let us shift the tide, Mr. President, and approve the Genocide Convention in 1984. Let us show the world our total commitment to human rights.

LEBANON AND U.S. MARINES

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, yesterday the President announced that the U.S. Marines will be withdrawn from the Beirut area in the next few weeks and stationed on board ships off the coast of Lebanon. This is the proper course of action to take at this time. The decision was made in light of the deteriorating military and political situation in Lebanon and in view of the fact that the presence of the multinational force is no longer likely to be able to contribute to a solution of Lebanon's problems. This move also has the effect of taking the Marines out of the immediate physical danger they faced near the Beirut airport, also a most welcome development.

The President also announced that U.S. air and naval forces in the area would operate under more flexible rules of engagement. This morning the battleship U.S.S. New Jersey opened fire with the 16-inch guns on Lebanese moslem and Syrian-held positions. This is only the second time the 16-inch guns have been used in Lebanon, and it is the first time they have been used for a purpose other than direct support and protection for the marines.

Unlike the decision to withdraw the Marines, this move to escalate our military involvement is a grave mistake. We are not at war in Lebanon, and the United States cannot, through the selective use of naval or air bombardment, determine the outcome of events in Lebanon. Employment of our forces in this manner will only serve to weaken further our political influence and our ability to contribute to the diplomatic settlement which ultimately will bring peace to Lebanon. For this reason, I believe that U.S. interests will be better served if we are not involved militarily in the Lebanese conflict.

A great deal remains to be decided in Lebanon and in the region as well. As the drama unfolds, the opportunities for diplomatic initiatives expand. The United States should be devoting all of its efforts to these diplomatic tasks, not to sailing off the coast lobbing occasional shells—even 16-inch shells—at Druze militia. Such actions are sound and fury. It is my strong belief that they achieve nothing concrete in the short run, and in the long run they further weaken our ability to achieve through negotiations that which is clearly unattainable through military force.

ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, Anatoly Shcharansky celebrated his 36th birthday in a Soviet prison on January 20, 1984. Now in his seventh year of imprisonment, Mr. Shcharansky is in poor health. More than 10 years after Soviet authorities first denied his request to emigrate from the country, Mr. Shcharansky holds strongly to his dream to emigrate to Israel.

His wife, Avital, has worked tirelessly for her husband's release. She has met with leaders around the world seeking help and assistance for her husband and for other Soviet Jews who are currently in prison, labor camp or exile and who have been refused permission to emigrate. I have met with Mrs. Shcharansky several times in Washington and once in Jerusalem. She is a dedicated and resolute woman.

In a recent article in the Jerusalem Post, the historian Martin Gilbert writes of Mr. Shcharansky's struggle and Avital's torment. I want to add my voice to Mr. Gilbert's and many others in reiterating that Mr. Shcharansky and fellow Soviet Jews are not forgotten. We in Congress will continue to offer our unrelenting support for their cause and for the cause of all who have been denied basic rights in the Soviet Union.

I ask unanimous consent that the article by Martin Gilbert be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A BIRTHDAY BEHIND BARS

A young Jew lies very ill in a Soviet prison. Last Friday, January 20, 1984, he celebrated his 36th birthday. Two weeks ago, when his mother was allowed to visit him, she could hardly recognize him. "I couldn't talk," she told friends, "I just looked at him and asked myself: what have they done to my son?"

Six months had passed since the last time the 75-year-old Ida Milgrom had been allowed to travel the 800 km. from Moscow to see her prisoner son, now in his seventh year of suffering, yet still scarcely half-way through his sentence.

The young man is Anatoly Shcharansky. He himself would prefer to use the name Natan Sharon, by which he intends to be known as soon as he reaches Israel: as soon as he is allowed to rejoin his wife Avital, who has lived in Jerusalem for nearly a decade.

Shcharansky was born in the Soviet Union four months before the establishment of the State of Israel. He first applied to go to Israel in 1973, some months before the Yom Kippur War. The mass movement of Soviet Jews in which he thus found himself, at the age of 25, was one of the 20th century's most dramatic movements of Jews to Israel. It was also one of the largest: between 1968 and 1982, more than 260,000 left the USSR.

More than 160,000 of these former Soviet Jews live in Israel today, reunited with their national centre, sharing its problems, and contributing to its strengths and struggles. Such was the scale of Soviet Jewry's emigration to Israel: a scale which has not perhaps, as yet, been adequately acknowledged, and whose many champions, both inside and outside the Soviet Union, have not yet received the accolade they deserve from the Jewish people.

Had Shcharansky's request for an exit visa been accepted in 1973, he would have been one of the 34,758 Jews allowed to leave the Soviet Union in that single year. Of this great number, a total of 33,277 chose Israel as their home.

Today, 10 years after Shcharansky's first refusal, the gates of emigration have been shut. Only 1,314 Jews were allowed to leave the Soviet Union in 1983. No former Prisoner of Zion, and only two long-term refuséniks, were among the 1,314 allowed out.

On March 15, 1977, less than four years after receiving his first refusal, Shcharansky was arrested. Held incommunicado for 16 months, he was tried in July 1978, and then sentenced to 13 years in prison and labour camp.

What "crime," in Soviet eyes, merited so severe a sentence? Why was the young Shcharansky—he was then just 30—given a heavier sentence than any previous Prisoner of Zion?

Like the 20 other Prisoners of Zion in prison, labour camp or exile today, Shcharansky did not act, and was not brought to trial, for himself alone. Had his, or theirs, been a selfish cause, a solely personal struggle, few people in the West would be concerned with his, or their, fate; or would campaign in so many diverse ways for his, and their, release.

Shcharansky was one of several hundreds of thousands of Soviet Jews who sought to be reunited with their Jewish national centre, Israel, and to lead a daily life amid Jewish values which were not under constant attack. He was also among those who actively and openly campaigned, inside the Soviet Union, for the right to go to Israel.

These campaigners of the early 1970s included many men more senior than Shcharansky, both as far as their own careers were concerned, and in relation to the Jewish movement: men like Prof. Alexander Lerner, who is still in Moscow after 12 years in refusal, and Dr. Alexander Lunz, who is now in Israel.

In the summer of 1974, as part of the struggle for the right to leave the USSR, a group of activists decided to inform the western world, and western Jewry, of the hardships under which those "in refusal" laboured. This knowledge, which included details of the suffering of those in prison, was passed to the West openly, signed with the names of all those who transmitted it. Some messages contained more than a hundred signatures. Most were signed by at least a dozen. Shcharansky's name was almost always on the list.

It happened that Shcharansky spoke excellent English. For this reason, he became both interpreter and a spokesman for the activists, especially when western visitors came to Moscow. His youthful zeal, his earnest concern for those in trouble, and his humour in adversity quickly impressed themselves on people who met him.

Neither Shcharansky himself, nor those with whom he was associated, was in any way anti-Soviet. They sought, and still seek, only to leave the Soviet Union, not to change it.

Some of the most active figures in the struggle, among them Mark Azbel, Victor Polsky and Alexander Voronel, received their exit visas and went at once to Israel. They were none of them dissidents, for whom exile would be a penance—as it was for Alexander Solzhenitsyn—but Jews for whom emigration was repatriation, and an escape from discrimination.

In August 1975 the Soviet Union signed the Helsinki Agreement, confirming earlier international rights of any individual to leave any country for another, and stressing the right of divided families to be reunited.

By that time, Shcharansky had been, for more than a year, one of a growing number of Soviet Jews who were in the divided family category. On July 4, 1974, on his release from two weeks in prison, with a number of other refuseniks at the time of Nixon's visit to Moscow, he had married a 23-year-old Jewish girl, Avital. Their marriage took place less than 24 hours before her own exit visa expired, and she had therefore to leave the country immediately.

Avital wished to remain with her husband. He urged her to go, having been promised that he would be allowed to join her within a few months. But this promise came to nothing.

On learning of the Helsinki Agreement, Shcharansky wrote to Avital: "They have signed an international agreement, and it speaks exactly of us: of the reunification of families and free emigration. Soon we will be together in Jerusalem."

When these hopes proved illusory, Shcharansky became more and more active in the emigration movement, helping to make known to the West many cases of hardship and injustice. In the spring of 1976 he helped to establish a small Moscow group to monitor the Soviet Union's fulfillment of the Helsinki Agreement.

This unofficial group contained only two Jews, one of whom, the late Prof. Vitaly Rubin, was soon given an exit visa, and came to Israel. None of the other members were Jewish activists, but Soviet citizens who sought the fulfillment of Helsinki in respect to other Soviet groups and rights. Among them was Elena Bonner, the wife of Academician Andrei Sakharov.

The Soviet authorities saw in this small group a focus of dissent, and of opposition to the regime. Shcharansky and Rubin saw in it a vehicle for the assertion of the Jewish right of emigration, and of the reunification of families.

Soviet Jewry was never organized in a "movement." No such organizations can exist in Russia today, outside Party approval and control. But the Soviet authorities were determined to find, to "expose," and to punish what they termed a clandestine "emigration group," Jews who were serving as the "paid agents" of American imperialism, furthering an imaginary world Jewish conspiracy, and maintaining links with espionage circles in the West.

Immediately after Shcharansky was arrested, strenuous efforts were made by interrogators throughout the USSR to find Jewish activists willing to confess to being members of such a conspiracy, and to link their efforts on behalf of Jewish emigration with "paid" anti-Soviet activists.

No such link existed, and no such links were found. Instead, and at considerable risk, activists in more than 20 Soviet cities spoke openly in Shcharansky's defense: among them Yosef Ash, Yakov Gordin, Lev Roitburd, Boris Tsitlonok, Benjamin Fein, Lev Ulanovsky and Dina Beilina, each of whom is now in Israel, and Victor Brailovsky, who is now in the final year of a five-year sentence of exile in Kazakhstan.

It was "crucial to note," Brailovsky told his interrogators, "that the accusations against Shcharansky were aimed not only against this one individual, but also against all Jewish activists."

At his trial, Shcharansky did not defend himself alone: he also defended the right of every Soviet Jew to go to Israel. When challenged with the evidence of his "Zionist activity," he replied with a short historical lecture. "There is," he explained to his accusers, "a growing Jewish national movement. Every nation goes through a stage of development of its natural growth, and now Zionism is a manifestation of the growth of Jewish nationalism." It was a fact, he added, "that there is a Jewish State."

Calmly, and with dignity, Shcharansky told the court: "Five years ago, I submitted my application for exit to Israel. Now I am further than ever from my dream. It would seem to be cause for regret. But it's absolutely otherwise. I am happy. I am happy that I lived honestly, in peace with my conscience. I never compromised my soul, even under threat of death."

He ended his defense: "For more than 2,000 years Jewish people, my people, have been dispersed. But wherever they are, wherever Jews are found, each year they have repeated, 'Next year in Jerusalem.' Now, when I am further than ever from my people, from Avital, facing many arduous years of imprisonment, I say, turning to my people, my Avital: 'Next year in Jerusalem!'; And I turn to you, the court, who are required to confirm a predetermined sentence: to you I have nothing to say."

Since Shcharansky's arrest, his friend and mentor Vladimir Slepak, the prisoners' champion Ida Nudel, the seminar leader Victor Brailovsky, and the Hebrew teacher Yosif Begun, have been among those Jews sentenced to long terms in prison, labour camp or exile for their part in the Jewish movement. Each one asserted, and continues to assert, the right of Soviet Jews to go to Israel, as well as their own personal desire to do so: Slepak to join his sister-in-law in Beersheba, Ida Nudel to join her sister in Rehovot, Brailovsky to join his father and his brother in Haifa.

Shcharansky and his fellow Prisoners of Zion know that they are not forgotten, that they are not alone; that their friends and relatives fight for them; that the Jewish world, with Israel at its core, cares for their fate and future, and awaits their return to their nation and their people. But the hardships of their punishment are real, and severe; their isolation is intense. Uncertainty is a cruel weapon used against them, and cruellest of all is the constant assertion of the Soviet authorities that they are alone, that nobody cares about them, that their western champions are silent.

During World War II, Martin Buber pleaded with the Jews of Palestine to practise a permanent grief, a daily alarm. For the Prisoners of Zion today, the plea is being answered by their many and devoted supporters. For Shcharansky, it is answered above all by Avital.

We here who see Avital Shcharansky's efforts on her husband's behalf can only marvel at the stamina and faith. He too, in his prison cell, knows of her struggle. A year ago, in a letter he was permitted to send her only after a four month hunger strike which greatly weakened him, he wrote: "What does my tireless traveller do now?

A shy and private person by nature, Avital drives herself to the verge of exhaustion, and is reluctant to rest, believing that each day's exertion may lead to her husband's release a day earlier.

Can Avital succeed in her quest? As she completes her most recent mission, in France, Britain, Holland and Sweden, she comment, "Maybe with this last push we can succeed."

Avital fights, as fight she must, for her husband. But hers is no selfish struggle, any more than his was. It's a spearhead of many struggles, a reflection of the needs of each of the 20 Prisoners of Zion, an inspiration to the many hundreds of divided families, to the 10,000 and more Soviet Jews still "in refusals and to a further 380,000 Soviet Jews who have sought, so far in vain, the initial invitation to Israel without which they cannot even ask to leave the Soviet Union.

SENATOR JOHN STENNIS

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, during the Christmas recess, I was alarmed, like many other Members of the Senate, to learn that JOHN STENNIS had been hospitalized with a serious illness.

On January 23, when we all reassembled, it was a highlight of that day for me to see the senior Senator from Mississippi able to be at his duty station to answer the very first rollcall of the year.

I knew that he would be present if it was at all possible. The words "duty, honor and country" are not just the motto at West Point. They are descriptive of the principles to which JOHN STENNIS has devoted his entire life. There is no instance in the record of his public career when he has deviated from his steadfast determination to do his duty to his country and to deal honorably and kindly with all of those around him.

I have personally observed the quiet and strong exercise of his immense influence and have watched him turn the tide at very critical times in Senate debate. He has been a consistent supporter of adequate national strength and preparedness.

Above all, JOHN STENNIS has demonstrated that a person can occupy a high office for many years and remain in the truest sense a public servant and a gentleman. He has never lost a sense of humility and an understanding of the people. He is a person of unfailing kindness and courtesy. I once heard a fellow Senator describing a tough task as being as "impossible as getting off an elevator after JOHN STENNIS."

He is a person of total integrity. I have been told that the only time he ever asked someone to leave his office was because the person involved had urged Senator STENNIS to break his word and cast aside a commitment which he had made. Any Senator could have told the person that JOHN STENNIS would never do that.

Recently, as we left a meeting where JOHN STENNIS had spoken, another Senator said to me, "Observe him closely because there will never be in the future, another man like JOHN STENNIS in the Senate."

I know what he meant. JOHN STENNIS is a unique product of his own rich experience. He has personally been a part of some of the greatest transitions in the South and in our Nation. He expresses himself in a unique and charming way. However, in a broader sense, I hope that there will be many who will follow the example that JOHN STENNIS continues to set for us. As long as our country maintains its greatness and the U.S. Senate remains an important part of its political process, men and women with the qualities of JOHN STENNIS will be needed.

Mr. President, all of us would say to JOHN STENNIS, "Thank you for the lessons which you teach us each day about integrity, careful judgment, quiet and unselfish courage, gentleness and kindness. We are glad that you are back with us, at your duty station where you are so badly needed."

ORDER TO RECEIVE AMENDMENTS TO S. 1765 DURING RECESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I conferred earlier today with the minority leader, who advised me that there is a caucus of his Members on this side of the aisle at this moment extending until 2 p.m. In a moment, I shall ask the Senate to recess until 2 p.m. Before I do so, under the rules, amendments may be filed to the bill only until 1 p.m. today in the event cloture is invoked tomorrow. Since we shall be in recess during that time, I ask unanimous consent that if we are in recess today past the hour of 1 p.m., notwithstanding that, it may be in order to receive amendments to qualify under the provisions of rule XXII to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 2 p.m. today.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 12:13 p.m., recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reconvened when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. WILSON).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

DEATH PENALTY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the managers of the bill are prepared to do so, I would yield the floor and inquire of the Chair if it will state the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1765) to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death, and for other purposes.

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, this bill provides a Federal procedure and criteria to meet the standards approved by the Supreme Court. Under the provisions of the bill, capital offenses are limited to treason, espionage, offenses resulting in the death of another person, and an attempt to assassinate the President that either injures the President or otherwise comes dangerously close to killing the President.

A prosecution for a capital offense would involve a two-stage trial. During the first stage, the jury or judge would consider only the issue of guilt and only evidence related to that issue would be admissible. Upon a finding of guilty of one of the specified capital offenses, if the Government has filed a pretrial notice of intent to seek the death penalty specifying the aggravating factors to be proved, the second stage of the trial would be entered and the jury would determine, pursuant to criteria set forth in the bill, whether or not the death penalty should be imposed.

The criteria, in essence, consists of statutory aggravating and mitigating circumstances for the jury or judge to use for guidance in the decisionmaking process with respect to the death penalty. The bill also contains a provision setting forth certain factors—much as race, color, or national origin of the defendant—that should not play a part in determining an appropriate sentence.

If the jury finds in the sentencing hearing that the death penalty is justified, the judge must impose the death penalty. If the jury fails to find the requisite aggravating criteria or, having found the existence of the aggravating criteria, determines that the record as a whole does not justify the death penalty, the judge must impose a sentence, other than death, authorized by law. If a sentence to life imprisonment is authorized and imposed, the court may specify that such term shall be served in full without parole.

The measure also provides for appellate review of a sentence of death with a priority over all other cases. The appellate court must affirm the sentence if it determines that the sentence was not imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor and the information supports the special findings required to be made by the tried-of-fact. I recommend to my colleagues the committee report on S. 1765 (S. Rept. 98-251) on the specifics of the bill.

Mr. President, I would like to reiterate some observations I have made in the past concerning the reasons I support the death penalty for certain heinous Federal crimes as a matter of legislative policy. Capital punishment—the supreme penalty for crime—has several valid justifications.

First, this severe penalty is a way for society to express its sense of outrage for intolerable conduct threatening the very foundations of society. Wanton and cruel murder is such a crime. In my judgment, the society that demands death as a penalty for the most aggravated murders send a signal that innocent life is precious indeed and cannot be violated without like consequence to the killer. I remember the observation of the late Senator McClellan almost 10 years ago:

Mr. President, when all is said and done, when all the talking about deterrence and retribution and incapacitation is finished, what it all boils down to is whether it is ever 'just' to impose the death penalty. Can a man ever be found to have acted so viciously, so cruelly, so much like an animal as to justify society in imposing upon him the ultimate punishment? I firmly believe he can.

Mr. President, people who commit such crimes have forfeited their own right to life. Every legislator, prosecutor, and court in this land should make the clearest statement that such inhuman conduct must not and will not be tolerated and that the lives of those who choose to perpetrate such violence will be swiftly and certainly taken from them. No lesser penalty will suffice.

Second, Mr. President, I am convinced that the death penalty is a deterrent for the crimes for which it is consistently imposed. There are some empirical studies that suggest a significant deterrent value, but the evidence seems to really be inconclusive. I believe in deterrence as a matter of logic. As stated by the Supreme Court in Gregg against Georgia:

Although some of the studies suggest that the death penalty may not function as a significantly greater deterrent than lesser penalties, there is no convincing empirical evidence either supporting or refuting this view. We may nevertheless assume safely that there are murderers, such as those who act in passion, for whom the threat of death has little or no deterrent effect. But for many others, the death penalty undoubtedly is a significant deterrent. There are carefully contemplated murders, such as murder for hire, where the possible penalty of death may well enter into the cold calculus that precedes the decision to act. And there are some categories of murder, such as murder by a life prisoner, where other sanctions may not be adequate.

Third, Mr. President, the total removal of a person from society just to protect the public from his future behavior is an appropriate objective of the death penalty. In some cases, imprisonment is simply not a sufficient safeguard against the future actions of criminals. Some criminals are incorrigibly antisocial and will remain potentially dangerous to society for the rest of their lives. Mere imprisonment offers these people the possibility of escape or, in some cases, release on parole. Even if they are successfully imprisoned for life, prison itself is an environment presenting dangers to guards, inmates, and others. In each of these cases, society is the victim. Basically, there is no satisfactory alternative sentence for these individuals. Life imprisonment without parole, although at first appearing to be a reasonable answer, is in reality highly unsatisfactory. Such a sentence greatly increases the danger to guards and to other prisoners who come into contact with those who have been so sentenced.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to emphasize an important point made by proponents and opponents of the death penalty—the taking of life is not simply different in magnitude from other coercive action against the person. It is different in kind. Murder is fundamentally different from all other offenses. So is the death penalty as punishment for such an offense. This is proper. In my judgment, the person who takes it upon himself to deprive the innocent and helpless of life—sometimes, Mr. President, in the most heinous and cruel manner—should in like manner forfeit his life. It is justice. And I am convinced it protects society from the violence of those who exploit and kill.

I hope the Senate will overwhelmingly endorse this long overdue measure.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, today, the Senate begins consideration of a long overdue measure to establish constitutional procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death for the most reprehensible Federal crimes. Except for a few substantive changes, and an effort to clarify and simplify the organization of the legislation, this bill is virtually identical substantively to S. 114 reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary in the 97th Congress on July 1, 1981 (See S. Rept. No. 97-143). The two important changes would first, authorize the judge when imposing a life term, in lieu of the death penalty, to provide that the sentence be served without parole; and second, permit consideration of nonstatutory aggravating factors, as well as nonstatutory mitigating factors, in deciding whether on the record as a whole the death penalty is justified in the case.

Mr. President, I submit that it is time for the U.S. Senate to consider the subject of the death penalty for the limited number of Federal crimes designated in this bill. Since 1972, when the U.S. Supreme Court in Furman against Georgia struck down Federal and State death penalty statutes that left to the unguided discretion of the jury or judge the determination of whether the death penalty should be imposed, American citizens have been left without the Federal protection that capital punishment can provide.

Murder in the United States today is hovering at an all-time high, having risen in two decades from approximately 8,700 homicides in 1969 to over 21,000 in the year 1982. Every day, we read newspaper stories describing violent criminal acts where someone is killed. Many of these killings are chilling in the cruelty and detachment with which the perpetrators tortune, maim, finally, extinguish innocent human life. We must do whatever we can to stop senseless murder. Our citizens deserve protection at every level of government—Federal, State, and local—from this scourge of violent crime.

Mr. President, it is important to note that the highly confusing Supreme Court decisions on capital punishment have not held the death penalty itself unconstitutional. The Court has held the penalty constitutional when under limited circumstances. Some 38 States have enacted legislation to try to satisfy the requirements set forth by the Supreme Court.

This bill provides a Federal procedure, as well as criteria to meet the standards approved by the Supreme Court. Under the provisions of the bill, capital offenses are limited to treason, espionage, offenses resulting in the death of another person, and an attempt to assassinate the President that either injuries the President or which fails only narrowly with regard to an attempt to kill the President.

A prosecution for a capital offense would involve a two-stage trial. During the first stage, the jury or judge would consider only the issue of guilt, and only evidence related to that issue would be admissible. Upon a finding of guilty of one of the specified capital offenses, if the Government has filed a pretrial notice of intent to seek the death penalty specifying the aggravating factors to be proved, the second stage of the trial would be entered and the jury would determine, pursuant to criteria set forth in the bill, whether or not the death penalty should be imposed.

The criteria, in essence, consists of statutory aggravating and mitigating circumstances for the jury or judge to use for guidance in the decisionmaking process with respect to the death penalty. The bill also contains a provision setting forth certain factors—such as race, color, or national origin of the defendant—that are not to play a part in determining an appropriate sentence.

In a prosecution for treason or espionage, the jury must find by a unanimous vote that at least one of the statutory aggravating factors applicable to these offenses exists, although it is unnecessary that there be a unanimous vote on any specific aggravating factor if a majority of the jury finds the existence of such a specific factor. If it does so, it must then by unanimous vote determine, in light of all the information presented—including nonstatutory mitigating and aggravating factors presented by the parties—whether the death penalty is justified.

On the other hand, for homicide and related offenses, the jury must first agree that the culpable involvement of the defendant in the offense was substantial under criteria set forth in the bill, or, in an attempt to kill the President, that the President was actually injured or dangerously close to being killed. I refer those who are interested to sections 3591 (b) and (c). Once the threshold finding is made, the jury must unanimously agree that at least one of the other aggravating factors specified in section 3592(c) exists, although it is unnecessary that there be a unanimous vote on any specific aggravating factor if a majority of the jury finds the existence of such a specific factor. If the jury findings meets this requirement, the jury must then determine, in light of all the information presented—including consideration of nonstatutory mitigating and aggravating factors presented by the parties—whether the death penalty is justified.

If the jury finds in the sentencing hearing that the death penalty is justified, the judge must impose the death penalty. If the jury fails to find the requisite aggravating criteria or, having found the existence of the aggravating criteria, determines that the record as a whole does not justify the death penalty, the judge must impose a sentence, other than death, authorized by law. If a sentence to life imprisonment is authorized and imposed, the court may specify that such term shall be served in full without parole.

The measure also provides for appellate review of a sentence of death with a priority over all other cases. The appellate court must affirm the sentence if it determines that the sentence was not imposed under the influence of passion, prejudice, or any other arbitrary factor and the information supports the special findings required to be made by the trier-of-fact.

Mr. President, I believe I have said enough to make my point or the points that need to be made with regard to this bill. I would only observe further that general and specific objections have been made to provisions of prior versions of this bill in the course of their consideration. I believe the committee report and supporting testimony in the hearings have adequately dealt with those concerns without my repeating prior arguments. Suffice it to say that the Senate has before it again a long overdue measure carefully drafted to meet constitutional muster under all of the Supreme Court decisions. I personally hope we will promptly pass this measure.

With that, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I suggest that all Senators who wish to be heard on this issue today come over to the floor and express themselves, because this is a very important issue and there is a lot of controversy concerning it.

In that regard, let me offer one more general thought on the controversy over the proposed restoration of the death penalty. In debating this issue, we hear a great deal of contradictory evidence on the deterrent value of capital punishment. Although I believe that there is compelling evidence in support of the proposition that capital punishment does have a substantial deterrent effect—particularly that offered by Prof. Isaac Ehrlich of the University of Chicago—this, in my view, is not ultimately the most compelling argument in support of capital punishment.

Ironically, it is only through the application of this sanction that civilized society is able to express the deep reverence that it places upon innocent human life. Although some may find it ironic, it is only through application of the most severe sanction that society has available that it is able to express its revulsion and repugnance toward those who would wrongfully deny innocent persons their life.

Some would characterize this as the "retribution" function of the criminal justice system. This is a legitimate function of the criminal justice system in my opinion. It is through such retribution that society expresses its outrage toward those who undermine the foundations of civilized society by contravening its most fundamental laws. The employment of the capital penalty reflects the fact that murderous criminals have not simply inflicted injury upon individual victims and their families and friends; they have further weakened the bonds, often tenuous ones, that hold communities together.

The retributive function of punishment was discussed recently by Dr. Walter Berns:

> We in the United States have always recognized the legitimacy of retribution. We have schedules of punishment in every criminal code according to which punishments are designed to fit the crime and not simply to fit what social science tells us about deterrence and rehabilitation: the worse the crime, the more severe the punishment. Justice requires criminals (as well as the rest of us) to get what they (and we) deserve and what criminals deserve depends on what they have done to us.

Similarly, Justice Holmes has written in "The Common Law":

> The first requirement of a sound body of law is that it should correspond with the actual feelings and demands of the community, whether right or wrong.

It is my view and I believe the view of the great majority of the American people that these feelings rightly and justly warrant the imposition of capital punishment under some circumstances.

In considering the bill before us, I was moved to consider the compelling words of a former colleague of ours, Senator JOHN MCCLELLAN, who remarked in a debate on a similar measure nearly 10 years ago:

> What other punishment is "just" for a man, found to be sane, who would stab, strangle, and mutilate eight student nurses?
> What other punishment is "just" for men who would invade the home of members of a rival religious sect and shoot to death men, women, and children, after forcing a mother to watch as her three young children were drowned before her eyes?
> What other punishment is "just" for a band of social misfits who would invade the homes of people they had never even met and stab and hack to death a woman eight and a half months pregnant and her guests?

To give merely one example from my own State: What other punishment is "just" for a gang of drug addicts who would invade a HI-FI store, corral up the employees and customers, puncture the eardrums of several with sharp instruments, force others to drink containers of acid, and coldbloodedly murder three innocent individuals? What other punishment is just for such individuals?

I do not apologize in the least for the deep feelings of emotion I have about these heinous crimes. I do not think that the American people should feel apologetic about their own emotional responses. It is when our society loses its sense of revulsion and anger about these offenses that I fear for our society. What other conceivable punishment is there in a compassionate society for a criminal who rapes and sodomizes and tortures a Stephanie Roper before brutally murdering her? There is no other conceivable punishment, in my view. Is it not time that those people who favor capital punishment take the offensive and regain their rightful claim to the position of respect for the value of human life?

Our society ought to be emotional about those who would transgress its deepest values, and violate its strongest bonds. In my view, it is because the criminal justice system in this country has increasingly divorced itself from the feelings of the citizenry—legitimate and compassionate and human feelings—that our criminal justice system is in the undisputed mess that it is today. It is long past the time that the people recover their criminal justice system from the control and domination of the "progressive" sociologists, the so-called civil liberties lawyers, and those who would endlessly call for rehabilitation no matter what the evidence and what the crime.

That persons who take the lives of others wrongfully ought to be subject to the most exteme criminal sanction reflects a social consensus that places great sanctity on the value of human life. It is a consensus that holds that individual offenders are responsible and accountable human beings, having it within themselves to conduct themselves in a civilized manner. It is also a consensus that holds that there is no crime more heinous than the deprivation of an innocent person's life.

Murder does not simply differ in magnitude from extortion or property destruction; it differs in kind as well. Its punishment ought to also differ in kind. Its sanction must acknowledge the inviolability and dignity of innocent human life. It must, in short, be proportionate. Those who support capital punishment have concluded that there is no other sanction that is "proportionate" to the crime of murder.

Let me again quote from Dr. Berns who is so eloquent on this subject.

> We think that some criminals must be made to pay for their crime with their lives and we think that we, the survivors of the world they violated, may legitimately extract that payment because we, too, are their victims. By punishing them we demonstrate that there are laws that bind men across generations as well as across (and within) nations, that we are not simply isolated individuals each pursuing his selfish interest.

Mr. President, let me conclude my statement by quoting from a letter than I received about 1½ years ago from a Jeffrey Clemans of Lawndale, Calif. Mr. Clemans writes:

> I figure when a 16-year-old girl can't walk from church to grandmother's house without being intercepted, immobilized, and tortured to death; then its time for me to write a few letters.

Mr. Clemans was referring to what I am afraid was a fairly routine homicide that had taken place in California and claimed the life of 16-year-old Shirley Lynette Ledford and a girl friend. The letter from Mr. Clemans continued:

> I wonder what raced through those girls' mind as their elbows and other joints were being smashed with a sledgehammer, as their flesh was being torn with pliers, as icepicks were about to be driven into their heads, as coathangers were tightened with pliers around their necks? I wonder what their last thoughts were on "the nation's number one problem" the economy. What were their last thoughts about men, about their parents for conceiving them on this planet? What were their final thoughts about the likelihood of a God in heaven?

Mr. Clemans concluded:

Do you think that there was a point during their ordeal that these children conceded their death? Did their screams for mercy change from "please don't do this to me" to "please finish me off"? Isn't it incredible to think that their actual rape was anticlimactic and that the most merciful think their captors did was to finally let them die?

I think Mr. Clemans is pretty eloquent in his letter to me.

Which side in the debate over capital punishment is demonstrating its respect for the sanctity of human life—Shirley Ledford's life? Is it those who would avenge her torture and killing? Is it those who would make clear society's revulsion toward this action by responding to it in the only proportionate way possible? Or is it those who would slap her murderer on the wrist, give him 10 to 20, promote his "rehabilitation," have him out on parole after he has been a model prisoner for 8 years, and allow him to enjoy the fruits of life—even those available to jailed criminals—which he so wantonly denied to Shirley Ledford?

Mr. President, I strongly urge the adoption of this measure as a first step by the Congress in reversing the tragically misguided criminal justice policy set in motion by the Supreme Court in its Furman and subsequent decisions. It is a first step toward enabling the American people to recapture its system of criminal justice.

I for one think it is a step long overdue and that this will resolve this matter in a procedural manner. I believe that the people of this country feel very strongly about these types of murders, about these types of activities, and very strongly that society is concerned about it. And I think it is time to be concerned about the victims of criminal conduct, maybe even as much as those who perpetrate criminal conduct.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the bill to reinstate capital punishment for a number of Federal offenses, not because I or any of the other opponents of capital punishment are less sickened by acts of violence than those who propose and support capital punishment as a solution. As a matter of fact, I think those of us who oppose capital punishment are at a minimum equally sickened by the horrors and the brutalities which exist in this society.

The issue is not whether those acts exist. They do. In disgraceful and disgusting and repeated numbers.

The question which has to be addressed is whether or not capital punishment will deter those acts, and also whether or not the possibility of mistake in this criminal justice system and any other criminal justice system, which is operated by human beings, is subject to error.

Mr. President, I want to recount for our colleagues one of the cases with which I am familiar, which is very similar in its horrors to the one which has just been described by the floor manager of the bill.

I would like to read from a newspaper article about this murder because it is similar to the incidents which Senator HATCH has just described.

This was a murder which took place in New Mexico, and the victim, whose name was Velten was found partially clad by two crow hunters in an arroyo just east of Albuquerque on February 13, 1974. His body had been there for days. He had been slashed repeatedly with a knife. He had been shot with a .22 four times in the head and once in the neck. A State pathologist told the detectives the autopsy showed Velten had been sodomized, that he was a long-time practicing homosexual and that the cuts had been made with a heated knife.

Another pathologist attending a convention in Dallas told the authorities by phone to look for a gang of roving homosexuals and he recalled two cases in which a gang added to its thrill by forcing a woman to witness the mutilation.

The prosecution in this case in New Mexico found that woman witness, and she told of being taken into a room that night and having her head held close while members of the Vagos motorcycle gang, the defendants, mutilated the victim. She told of being raped herself and being slashed under both breasts with a knife that they had pulled from the flames of the room's gas heater. She told of witnessing the sodomy, the shooting, and of being blindfolded and taken in the van to the arroyo where Velten's body was dumped.

I am going to read a little further from that article later, but I think I have read enough, I hope, to give us the flavor of a brutal, horrible, sick murder that occurred in New Mexico not too many years ago.

It is a case with which I am personally familiar because the men convicted of that crime who were on death row were from Michigan. They were motorcyclists who were specifically identified by this woman witness whose testimony I have summarized. They were pointed out in court as being the ones who were responsible for these horrible mutilated deaths which I have described.

Anybody who was at that trial, or anybody who reads about this incident, who is not sickened is not normal or not human, as far as I am concerned. The same is true for the incidents which have been related to us by my friend Senator HATCH.

The problem is, in this case that the woman was wrong. Let me repeat that. It goes to the heart of the criminal justice system and one of the problems of capital punishment. The problem in this case that I have read about is that the woman was wrong. She erred, she perjured herself, she lied.

A number of Michigan men who were motorcyclists, by the way, were on death row for a long time awaiting their execution when a number of newspaper reporters from my home State got interested in the case and they dug, and they dug, and they dug. Because these defendants had not yet been executed and were still alive, and there was something to save and correct, years later these newspaper reporters dug up the truth. The truth was that a totally different set of motorcyclists, totally unrelated to these defendants from Michigan, were the perpetrators or at least were later found guilty of the same murder. The truth is that the woman, who so clearly and forcefully pointed out the first set of defendants, put them on death row and would have had them executed, perjured herself.

These are not isolated instances in a criminal justice system based on human beings, based on the kind of passions which exist in our society. I have represented a man who spent over 30 years in prison in the State of Michigan in a capital case who was completely and totally innocent of the murder for which he was found guilty.

His name was Charles Clark. He spent over 30 years of his life in a prison in Michigan for a crime he did not commit, was nowhere near, had no involvement in, knew nothing about. It was only because we had an investigator in our office who could find the witness who testified against him 30 years later, who would say, very innocently, "Well, my Heavens, I picked him out because the detective told me he was the one who killed my father. I did not know who it was when I said it was him. The detective told me it was him."

That is why he was convicted of first-degree murder. If Michigan had the death penalty he would not have been around to save 30 years later. He was so determined to prove himself innocent, may I say to my friend, that he refused two commutations of his sentence by two different Governors of Michigan because he was determined to walk out of that prison a free man without the cloud of guilt about him. And he finally did.

So I personally have represented a man in a capital case who was convicted by error, and there are many of them throughout history.

They are tough to prove after they are executed. It is tough to prove that Sacco and Vanzetti did not commit the murders for which they were convicted. But the Governor of Massachusetts said, "Let us have a Sacco-Vanzetti Day," and there is now a Sacco-Vanzetti Day in Massachusetts, to commemorate two people that the Governor of Massachusetts said were executed because of the inflamed prejudice at the time.

I can read case after case of horrors that exist in this society. I have represented people who have committed such acts.

That is not hard. It really is not very hard. I can read case after case of brutality and sodomy, and I would think that this Chamber's passions would be inflamed just the way the jury was in New Mexico.

The problem is that you cannot cure your mistakes when you put people to death, and we make mistakes. We may not make them every day and they are not pristine clear sometimes. Sometimes they involve, was the person really insane or crazy? Let me tell you, it is plenty tough to dig up evidence after a person has been executed. In fact, it is almost impossible because the reason to do it is gone. It becomes now saving a name. It then becomes the children, the grandchildren, the great grandchildren, of somebody they feel was innocently convicted and executed. You have to try, try to preserve a name.

I do not have any tears or sympathy, frankly, for the perpetrators of crime. None whatsoever. I have as much desire to deter crime as any Senator in this room. I have had as much personal experience with it and I know what it means. I come from a city that is riven with it, riven with murder. I know what crime means in a society. Those of us who oppose the death penalty are as much opposed to the violent acts which are perpetrated in this society as those who support the measure.

That is not the issue. The issue is not whether you or I, or those who oppose or propose the death penalty, are more or less disgusted or determined to deter. The issue is whether the death penalty deters, and whether or not, in a system which is based on human beings, we can safely execute when we know we make mistakes. I am going to read of some of those mistakes, and I will put mistakes in the RECORD, in capital cases. I will take some time doing this, because I think the matter is worthy of it. I think those who are for the death penalty, as well as those who are opposed to it, agree that this subject is worthy of debate. So I will put some cases into the RECORD where mistakes have been made in capital cases, to show that it is indeed possible.

We will also put some evidence into the RECORD that capital punishment does not deter; that, as a matter of fact, the States that have capital punishment have twice as high a murder rate as the States that do not. Think about it. The States that have capital punishment have twice the murder rate of those that do not.

I know that my friend is on his feet, and I am happy to yield for a question, without yielding my right to the floor.

Mr. HATCH. I thank my colleague for yielding.

I find absolutely no fault with what the distinguished Senator has found. Where there is injustice in the criminal justice system, there is no question that all of us lose. There is no question that there are isolated cases in which people have been falsely accused, and falsely convicted, and where people have been wrongfully put to death. I do not think there is any question about that.

On the other hand, is the Senator arguing that because of these isolated cases which do arise, which have to concern any reasonable human being, there is no validity in having a capital punishment law for any reason beyond this day; that, therefore, we should just have incarceration as the major deterrent or the major punishment to resolve some of these heinous crimes? This bill would provide life sentences that stick for life, without parole.

Is that what the Senator is saying: that regardless of how many heinous murders are committed in this country, where they know who did it, where there is not the slightest shred of proof otherwise, where there is not the slightest doubt in the minds of people, where the murder is offensive, vicious, and brutal, there should be no ultimate sanction or punishment for those people?

Mr. LEVIN. I am going to be giving cases where there was absolutely no doubt that the defendant was guilty. As a matter of fact, in any case of conviction, they must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty. That is the jury's sworn oath.

I will cite cases in which the defendant confessed and was not guilty and had nothing to do with it. I will give cases where the person who confessed had absolutely nothing to do with the crime.

There are a number of reasons to oppose capital punishment. One is that we cannot cure our mistakes, and we make them. We do not know whether it is 1 in 100 or 1 in 1,000, and it is hard to define mistake absolutely. But we do make mistakes.

Second, capital punishment does not deter. Most studies show that you cannot prove deterrence by having capital punishment. The statistics show me quite the opposite, and I will repeat that, because to me it is a startling statement. States that have capital punishment have twice the murder rate of those States that do not have capital punishment.

Third, many of us have a moral revulsion to the State taking human life. Particularly in the religious community there is a deepseated revulsion to capital punishment. That is a third reason why many of us oppose capital punishment.

In this regard, I should like to read for my friend a letter which was received from many religious organizations which I will identify. The religious community in America is almost unanimous in its opposition to capital punishment. In November of 1983, a letter from the religious leadership was delivered to each of us, in opposition to reinstituting capital punishment at the Federal level. This letter reads as follows:

As representatives of national religious organizations we appeal to you to oppose S. 1765, a bill to reinstate the death penalty, which may come before the Senate in the near future. We oppose any legislation which sanctions the use of capital punishment.

We believe in the sanctity of human life. The taking of human life, whether it be an independent criminal act or sanctioned by the state, is inhumane. Our religious convictions lead us to the belief that each individual has worth and dignity.

We recognize that government has the responsibility to protect its citizens. Such responsibilities are necessary and should be carried through in a positive manner that leads to a safe, equitable, and just society. Our work brings us into touch with the deepest dimensions of the lives of both the victims and the perpetrators of violent crimes in our communities. We have witnessed the tragedy brought into the lives of victims of violent crime and also in the lives of those who commit such crimes. We believe that the death penalty fails to achieve the goal of protecting society and in fact perpetuates this tragic cycle of vengeance and violence.

The death penalty is irreversible and does not represent an effective law enforcement measure. By its very nature, the death penalty undermines our inherent respect for human life and eliminates any possibility of reform or of real restitution to society. Due process protections or jury attempts to weigh various mitigating and aggravating factors cannot provide an adequate safeguard against mistaken verdicts. The taking of human life is far too serious an act to contemplate when there is any possibility of error.

The United States is the only nation in North America with an active death penalty. Furthermore, virtually all countries in western Europe have abolished this ultimate punishment.

I should like to read that again, because my friend made reference to what the civilized societies do to express their revulsion. So I will repeat that line from this letter, because there are plenty of civilized societies—indeed, the majority in Western Europe—that have abolished capital punishment. That sentence reads:

Furthermore, virtually all countries in western Europe have abolished this ultimate punishment. We believe that the United States should follow the example of western Europe, for this would be a move toward greater humaneness and compassion. Such an initiative would be an effective testimony to those nations which tragically take unto themselves the right to execute their own citizens.

Passage of the bill may involve praise from many citizens but it would represent only a hollow victory. Enactment of the death penalty would not accomplish our goal of finding a solution to the real problems of crime and violence. We urge you to oppose the death penalty and instead seek alternatives which respect the sacredness of human life.

That letter was written to every Member of the Senate. Perhaps the most pointed sentence in it, and I think it contains a lot of extremely important sentences, is this:

We believe the death penalty fails to achieve the goal of protecting society and in fact perpetuates this tragic cycle of vengeance and violence.

We should listen very carefully, when we are talking about moral revulsion, to who signed this letter. This letter represents almost a consensus in the national religious organizations against capital punishment. I think there is a real embodiment of a moral spirit in those organizations. Here are the organizations that are represented by these signatories: the National Council of Churches, the National Council of Catholic Charities, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the National Office of Jesuit Social Ministries, the United Church of Christ, the Washington Ethical Action Office, the United Methodist Church, the Mennonite Central Committee, the Lutheran Church in America, the American Jewish Committee, the Presbyterian Church, the Church of the Brethren, the Episcopal Church, the National Assembly of Religious Women, Clergy and Laity Concerned, Friends Committee on National Legislation, the American Jewish Congress, the Unitarian Universalist Association, Network, the American Baptist Churches, the Synagogue Council of America.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter that was addressed to each Senator be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A.,
The Washington Office, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: As representatives of national religous organizations we appeal to you to oppose S 1765, a bill to reinstate the death penalty, which may come before the Senate in the near future. We oppose any legislation which sanctions the use of capital punishment.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, as I indicated, I oppose this bill to reinstitute capital punishment, for a number of reasons.

The first reason that I have cited is that our system of justice is not foolproof. Human error can lead to irreparable mistakes. Based on my personal experiences as a defense lawyer and as head of the appellate section of the defender's office in Detroit, I know that mistakes happen frequently and that they happen in capital cases. I also know that it is difficult, if not impossible, to prove that a miscarriage of justice has occurred after someone has been executed.

During the debate on this effort to reestablish the death penalty, I will be citing a number of cases where innocent people have been convicted of capital crimes. An examination of these cases shows that it often takes years before it can be proven that a person has been a victim of a miscarriage of justice.

Mr. President, a judicial system which depends on human beings can cause human errors. One such error occurred in my own experience in my own State of Michigan. In 1967, a client of mine named Charles Clark walked out of prison a free man, after having spent 30 years in prison for a crime he never committed. Michigan was the first State to abolish the death penalty for murder, which was fortunate for Mr. Clark. In 1937, he was found guilty of shooting and killing a store owner during a robbery. At his trial, Mr. Clark was positively identified by the daughter of the dead man and that identification overcame his own defense that he was innocent.

Long after the verdict was rendered and the appeals process had run its course, Charles Clark continued to fight to prove his innocence. Indeed, he was so insistent on establishing his innocence that he declined offers by a number of Governors to commute his sentence because he believed that acceptance of commutation would have been at least a tacit admission of guilt.

When Charles Clark's case was assigned to me as a member of the public defender's office, I was intrigued by his adamant insistence on his innocence. I pored over the trial transcript and gradually became convinced that there was at least the possibility that Clark was telling the truth. I asked an investigator assigned to our office to try and track down the daughter of the store owner—the only eyewitness to the crime. She was a young, impressionable girl at the time of the trial. When she was asked in the courtroom, "Are you sure that Charles Clark was the man who stood behind you?" She answered, "I am." When asked again, "Are you positive that he had a gun in his hand?" She answered, "I am." That testimony and that testimony alone was what convicted Charles Clark.

Amazingly enough, 30 years after the trial, our investigator was able to find the witness who identified Charles Clark and she readily agreed to discuss the case with him. In those discussions it soon became clear that she had never really seen her father's killer. In an affidavit she subsequently filed with the court, she readily acknowledged that her identification of Charles Clark as the killer resulted from a detective telling her that Charles Clark had killed her father. She did not have any personal recollection of Charles Clark when she identified him in court.

Based on the affidavit, Charles Clark was found to be innocent of the crime and released from prison. His story is tragic because he spent 30 years behind bars for something he did not do. But—and this can only give us cold comfort—at least he was able to walk out of that prison alive and free. If there had been a death penalty statute in effect in Michigan when Charles Clark was convicted of murder, he might have been sentenced to death and executed for a crime he never committed. His innocence could never have been established.

All of us, I suspect, are victims of our own experiences. My experience with Charles Clark and my research into other cases like his, has convinced me that the possibility of error in capital cases is real.

Another case that I am personally familiar with involved a number of Michigan men who were convicted of a horribly gruesome murder in New Mexico. These four men were convicted of murdering a man in New Mexico and were sent to death row, where they spent over 2 years before being completely exonerated of the crime. Three reporters from the Detroit News decided to get involved in the case after the girl friend of one of the men contacted the newspaper. These investigators struggled for 14 months while the Michigan men were on death row to get to the real facts of the case. The reporters tracked down the prosecution's principal witness, who recanted her story and admitted that it was the result of prosecutorial pressure to find someone to put behind bars.

Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to read an article from the Detroit News magazine which describes this error of justice in detail:

[From the Detroit News, Jan. 11, 1976]

THE INSIDE STORY OF HOW THE NEWS FREED FOUR FROM DEATH ROW

On Friday, Feb. 8, 1974, Thomas V. Gladish, a prospect for membership in the Los Angeles area Vagos Motorcycle Club, was ready to crash after 72 hours of gobbling amphetamines to keep his eyes open.

Running errands for the Vagos helped keep him awake. So did ripping off a rival motorcyclist's pad of stove, ice box and other items.

His accomplice was Ronald B. Keine, known as "Grub."

There was more to this day. While Gladish and Keine were running around suburban Los Angeles, fellow cyclist Clarence Smith Jr. ("Sandman") roughed up a rival clubman who trespassed into Vagos "territory."

Then he got drunk, shot at some stray dogs and was fined $5 for missing the Vagos club meeting that night.

Also stoned and useless from too much booze and pills was Arthur Ray Smith (the "Monterey Flash" because he moves so slowly). But Arthur (no relation to Clarence Smith) was at least physically present at the meeting.

Friend Richard Wayne Greer ("Doc") was more practically engaged. He spent that day borrowing a Dodge van and stocking it for a trip to Detroit.

If the day had not been so wildly typical, the Vagos might have been able to prove five months later that they truly spent it in suburban Los Angeles.

Instead, a Bernalillo County, N.M., jury chose to believe they murdered 26-year-old William B. Velten a $6-a-night Albuquerque motel room more than 800 miles away.

All but Arthur Smith—who prosecution "eyewitness" Judy Weyer simply forgot to implicate—were convicted of first degree murder, kidnapping, sodomy and rape and sent to death row to await the gas chamber.

Ever since Marlon Brando starred in "The Wild One," people have cherished and feared the image of a Hell's Angels-style horde of two-wheeled gangsters roaring out of a nightmare to terrorize some hapless town.

This was evident on June 5, 1974, when District Judge William F. Riordan ordered the county sheriff to take the bikers to the state prison outside Santa Fe where they were to be led into the dull green gas chamber on Aug. 1.

Aging Sheriff Lester Hay—since retired by the Albuquerque-Bernalillo County voters—passed out shotguns and ammunition to his wind-blown, sunburned troops.

Playing up his role in solving New Mexico's "crime of the decade," he had pledged to defend this town of a quarter-million against a band of "California marauders" who he warned might be just over the rise and riding hard to free their murderous companions.

Such was the atmosphere surrounding the investigation, the trial, and, now, the transfer of prisoners.

Hay's deputies shuffled nervously from foot to foot, checking and rechecking their weapons.

The bikers, strung together in leg irons, wondered whether they would even make it to death row.

One of their defense attorneys wandered in and was struck by a "paranoid feeling" his clients were being set up for a fatal escape try.

He confronted Hay. They stared at each other. Then Hay turned to the deputies and said: "I don't want no gunplay, boys," the attorney recalled.

The deputies relaxed.

The marauders never came.

Clarence Smith, Greer, Gladish and Keine began 18 months inside death row's small basement cells. A routine appeal had postponed the execution date.

In early November, 1974, Rose M. Bucca of Warren wrote a letter to the Detroit News addressed to the feature editor, William W. Lutz. It began: "To whom it may appeal to. . . ."

She said her "ole man" (her boyfriend) and his "brothers" had been framed for a particularly brutal homosexual mutilation murder on the testimony of a woman whose early statements to the police become increasing elaborate as authorities uncovered "new" facts.

Albuquerque was a town, she wrote, where the populus lined courtroom corridors to catch a glimpse of "those animals." The defendants were doubly damned, portrayed both as outlaw motorcyclists and from California, a state whose reputation for harboring dangerous kooks is widespread in America.

She wrote that both Smiths, Greer and Keine originally were from Michigan and had friends and relatives in the Detroit area. Even Velten, the victim, was born in Grand Rapids and had lived in Detroit before moving west.

"How can a whole state sit by and watch as four innocent men go to the gas chamber?" she pleaded.

Lutz referred the letter to Boyd Simmons, assistant managing editor (now retired), who headed The News' "Secret Witness" program which has solved 40 murders.

Simmons called on reporters Douglas Glazier, a veteran of more than two decades of crime reporting, and Stephen Cain, who also had worked numerous homicide investigations.

Any major newspaper, during the course of a year, gets scores of letters from inmates who claim they were framed. Most are transparent lies. Simmons decided this one bore investigating.

Simmons, supported by Burt Stoddard (now News managing editor), wrote and asked the Albuquerque newspapers to send The News clippings about the investigation and trial. These were studied. Phone calls to a dozen figures in the case produced more questions than answers.

The bikers, using borrowed and stolen credit cards, had left a trail of dated gasoline purchase slips from California to Oklahoma. The slips appeared to be powerful alibi evidence.

To account for the dates, District Attorney James Brandenburg argued that the bikers had killed Velton in Albuquerque, dumped the body east of town, doubled back west into Arizona, and then retraced their original route through Albuquerque, past the body, and on east toward Detroit.

It was theoretically possible, but lawyers often refer to stories like this as "inherently incredible."

Reporters Cain and Glazier asked New Mexicans about Brandenburg himself. "He's going to be governor," came the almost universal reply.

Described as a superb trial lawyer, he was articulate, intelligent, urbane, wealthy, ambitious and had the kind of rugged western good looks enhanced by a blue suit and new Stetson hat.

An election was coming up, and here was the most sensational criminal case in local memory.

Brandenburg turned over the actual conduct of the case to an aggressive young assistant, Brian M. Gross, who had handled no more than six or eight felony trials.

Yet, by making the closing argument to the jury, Brandenburg was close enough to claim credit but distant enough to remain unblemished if the case soured.

The News team at first suspected that the bikers killed Velten but that the authorities had sanitized the evidence to gain a conviction.

A single Sunday story was planned.

Glazier flew to Albuquerque to talk to the defense attorney, the sheriff's and district attorney's investigators, read the trial transcript and view whatever original police reports were available.

Cain flew to Los Angeles to check the background of the Vagos, interview exdefendant Arthur Smith and Alan Well, the cycle club's attorney.

One story turned into 100.

To the News team, it increasingly became apparent that the sheriff's detectives had put together the case through a series of inspired guesses.

Velten's partially clad body was found by two crow hunters in the Tijeras Canyon arroyo just east of Albuquerque on Feb. 13, 1974. It had been there for days.

He had been slashed repeatedly with a knife. His penis had been severed and placed in his mouth, and he had been shot with a .22 four times in the head and once in the neck.

A state pathologist told the detectives the autopsy showed Velten had been sodomized, that he was a longtime practicing homosexual and that the cuts had been made with a heated knife.

Another pathologist, attending a convention in Dallas, told the authorities by phone to look for a gang of roving homosexuals. He recalled two cases in which such a gang added to its thrill by forcing a woman to witness the multilation.

Someone suggest motorcyclists.

The case was getting nowhere. Then late in February, Sheriff's Chief of Detectives Santos Baca recalled hearing a Feb. 9 radio message from Tucumcari, N.M., to be on the lookout for a van with California plates. The five occupants were wanted for the supported armed robbery of two hippie hitchhikers. He figured the van would have passed through Albuquerque about the time of Velten's death.

Baca learned the Californians had been arrested outside Oklahoma City during the early morning hours of Feb. 10. They carried hunting knives and a pair of 22's. And meeting the pathologist's prediction," they were cyclists.

The knives bore no evidence, and neither of the 22's matched the bullets taken from Velten. Still the bikers were the only game in town.

If the five out-of-town bikers did it, the police reasoned that they had to establish how the suspects met the victim. If Velten was homosexual, a gay bar seemed a likely place.

Sheriff's Detectives Gil Candalaria and Robert Tena showed pictures of Velten and the bikers at several known gay bars without result.

But in the process they visited a cheap motel which catered to gay patrons and stumbled across a part-time maid, Mrs. Judy Weyer. They left with the impression that she was "real nervous."

Nearly a month had passed since the murder.

Interviewed at the motel, Mrs. Weyer told Detectives Candalaria and Tena about a group of young men who had registered as "Mr. and Miss Butt," stayed for several days, had several female visitors, were raucus, difficult and left the room a mess.

What actually went on during subsequent questioning remains a matter of bitter, unresolved debate. She did make three written and numerous oral statements.

The detectives now had emerged with a "woman forced to witness mutilation, fulfilling the prophecy of the Dallas pathologist. The several-day motel stay was telescoped down to one, Feb. 8, and Mrs. Weyer subsequently identified all five Vagos.

Rose Bucca seemed to be correct in her original letter to The News. Each new statement Mrs. Weyer made nicely excluded earlier contentions the authorities had discovered to be false. Each new statement appeared to include whatever new facts the probers unearthed about the murder.

Her final story was sensational.

In her statement, Mrs. Weyer said she met Keine on her way to lunch on Feb. 8, felt sorry for him and let him have a room without registering.

She told of being taken into the room that night and having her head held close while the Vagos mutilated Velten. She told of being raped herself and being slashed under both breasts with a knife they had pulled from the flames of the room's gas heater.

She told of witnessing the sodomy, shooting, and of being blindfolded and taken in the van to the arroyo where Velten's body was dumped.

On March 12, 1974, Magistrate James O'Toole signed the warrants charging the five and set bail at $100,000 each.

On March 20, District Judge William Riordan accepted their innocent pleas at arraignment and upped the bonds to $250,000 each.

On May 20, Riodan opened the trial amid ostentatious security.

The defense was a disaster.

There were four original defense attorneys—Ronald Ginsburg, Well, George Henry Farrah and Mrs. Alice Hector—and four philosophies of defense.

The five defendants were given clean clothes but were allowed to face the jury retaining their long hair and beards . . . the California marauder image.

The Public Defender's investigators turned up impressive alibi witnesses who put the bikers in Arizona early on Feb. 9.

Other members of the Vagos, imported to substantiate the defendants' Feb. 8 California alibi, also made an impression, a bad one.

Attorney Well had enjoyed considerable California success on behalf of the Vagos by tripping up arresting officers on cross-examination.

The Albuquerque officers didn't trip.

Well hammered at Mrs. Weyer, hammered at her inconsistencies, hammered to the point he felt confident she had been demolished as a witness.

Judge Riodan, in an unusual display of judicial discretion for a capital case, cut short Well's interrogation.

"She's a simple girl," said Assistant DA Gross, explaining the inconsistencies in her story.

A prosecution doctor added what was taken to be convincing verification of a key part of Mrs. Weyer's incredible story. He testified that she indeed had half-moon scars under both breasts, made by the tip of a heated knife.

He also noticed identical hot knife scars down the backs of her legs, a revelation even to Mrs. Weyer.

Defense attorney Well had what he thought was an ace in the hole.

Convinced of the bikers' innocence and armed with several books on polygraphs, he worked out an arrangement under New Mexico law for the defendants to take lie detector tests and have the results given to the jury.

Independent polygraph expert James Wilson—who became a contract employe of the Sheriff's Department after the trial—testified that two of the bikers flunked when they denied the killing. He said the results of the other three were inconclusive.

The prosecution leaned heavily on testimony that hairs found in the Vagos' van could have come from Velten and that several bloodstains on a blanket matched his moderately unusual B-postive blood type.

The charges against Arthur Smith were dismissed when Mrs. Weyer failed to testify that he had done anything specific during the murder orgy.

Gross was furious. He turned his full attention to insuring the case against the remaining four.

On the eve of the trial; closing day, Gross and a young aide went bar hopping. They later appeared in court with a father and son who swore they had seen several of the defendants in Albuquerque on Feb. 8, four months earlier. Gross had found what proved to be clinching "evidence."

The jury took 15 hours to reach a conviction.

A mystery gun—stuffed in a paper bag—had remained in the courtroom for several days during the trial. Gross made no move to introduce it as evidence.

Defense attorneys Farrah and Ginsburg were to tell The News that Gross had admitted to them during the trial that the revolver had been found in the arroyo. They said Gross told them that ballistics tests showed the gun was a "positive mismatch" with the fatal bullets.

A year-and-a-half later, the gun would be resurrected to save the defendants' lives.

Cain, back from his first California trip in late November, 1974, say the Vagos as overgrown juvenile delinquents, mixing pot, pills, booze and minor league criminality. The club members' extensive police records contained no hint of violent homosexuality.

Glazier sensed that the atmosphere in Albuquerque easily could contribute to an emotional verdict—and possibly a wrong one.

He returned to Detroit with the trial transcript and copies of dozens of police reports. They contained scores of inconsistencies. The original police investigation had ignored a number of leads which appeared to point away from the bikers.

The News' Simmons felt the key was Judy Weyer, a mother of four who had abandoned her family in Minnesota before going to Albuquerque. Did she tell the truth?

Before the verdict was given, she left the courtroom and dropped out of sight. The Albuquerque authorities refused to say where she was.

Mrs. Weyer had testified she was born in St. Cloud, Minn., and Cain flew there on a hunch. He traced her parents, John and Dorothy McCall, through court records. They lived in a ramshackle house, without indoor plumbing on the banks of the Mississippi River 20 miles outside St. Cloud.

McCall and Cain sipped peppermint schnapps and talked hard times. Eventually the father agreed to lead Cain to Mrs. Weyer, who was living in a trailer park 10 miles away.

The next morning, Cain knocked on her door. The Judy Weyer who answered did not appear to be the "moral leper" described by Bernalillo County investigators.

With downcast eyes and monotone voice, she repeated the details of what the bikers had done to her and Velten. She repeated the same descriptive phrases recorded in the trial transcript, in the same order.

Cain was somewhat surprised that she showed no resentment toward the bikers for the ordeal they had put her through.

Yet, when she was asked how the authorities had treated her, Mrs. Weyer flashed with anger.

She said the detectives had threatened to jail her for five years for perjury if she didn't back up her police statements in court. For testifying, she said Chief of Detectives Baca promised her way would be paid through secretarial school.

Mrs. Weyer told Cain her one-time Albuquerque boyfriend, Jose Antonio Rivera, also had been arrested during the murder investigation. She said the detectives tried alternately to get her to implicate Rivera in the murder and get Rivera to testify against the bikers.

She said she hadn't been able to remember the date the bikers were at the motel and that the detectives "put it up to me" that it had to have been Feb. 8.

Then came the first "bomb." The prosecution's Albuquerque doctor was wrong when he testified the bikers used a hot knife to slice down the back of her thighs. She said the red marks, which she no longer had, were caused by the seams in a pair of too-tight slacks.

Armed with this information, The News printed its first biker story on Dec. 8, 1974.

Called by Glazier, District Attorney Brandenburg defended the investigators, insisted the bikers were guilty beyond any doubt but promised to check the "tight pants" statement. He didn't.

When The News published additional stories describing discrepancies its reporters uncovered, Assistant DA Gross wrote News Editor Martin Hayden trying to get Glazier fired as "incompetent."

Then, in an apparent attempt to send the reporter on a wild goose chase, he was told to look into a "second group of California motorcyclists" who had stayed at the murder motel.

What the investigator didn't know was that the second group had information contradicting Mrs. Weyer's trial testimony and would play a pivotal role a month later in her decision to repudiate her testimony.

The investigator also told Glazier about a blond teenage girl who he said had witnessed some—possibly all—of the events at the motel and would have supported Mrs. Weyer had she been willing to talk.

This information also was to help destroy the police case.

The News was able to identify her as Shelly Fish, living with her husband at the Quantico Marine Base in Virginia.

Simmons sent John Peterson of The News Washington Bureau to Quantico, where Mrs. Fish talked freely.

She declared she had stayed at the Albuquerque motel where Mrs. Weyer had worked during February, 1974, but had seen none of the events supposedly witnessed by the part-time maid.

She told Peterson that the Bernalillo County authorities lured her back to Albuquerque just before the trial to view photographs of the Vagos. She said they held her incommunicado for two weeks when she failed to recognize them.

Mrs. Fish accused polygraph expert Larry Galbraith—who is now under sheriff—of deliberately flunking her on repeated lie tests when she truthfully insisted she knew nothing of the Vagos or the murder.

As part of what she called an effort to get her to testify falsely, Mrs. Fish said sheriff's officers sent her to a psychiatrist to "unblock my memory."

The News' investigation now had continued for two months. It had produced a welter of confusion. The bikers were not the nation's best citizens, but maybe, just maybe, they were being executed for a crime they didn't commit.

Yet, The News had been unable to turn up any solid new evidence.

Simmons decided to keep digging.

Glazier returned to Albuquerque and confronted Assistant DA Gross. He asked about the lack of evidence supporting Mrs. Weyer's testimony that the murder took place at the motel.

Gross confided over drinks that he actually believed up to 13 people—including the bikers—were involved in the Velten murder.

He suggested the murder may have taken place in the arroyo near where the body was found.

If the authorities didn't wholly believe their own case, why were they so sure the bikers were guilty?

The answer came from Tucumcari in neighboring Quay County where the bikers had been charged with the Feb. 9, 1974 robbery of two hippie hitchhikers.

According to a written report from Detective Tena to his superiors, the hippies had said the bikers threatened "they would cut them up in the same way they did the guy in Albuquerque."

If the bikers, on Feb. 9, actually had referred to cutting up someone in Albuquerque, then the authorities had good reason to believe they killed Velten. His slashed and multilated body wasn't found until Feb. 13, four days later.

Both Cain and Glazier talked to Quay County Assistant DA Pete Bidwell, who Detective Tena identified as the source of his information on the threat.

Bidwell searched both his memory and his notes but drew a blank on any reference either to Albuquerque or a threat.

The News' stepped-up probe began to pay off in January, 1975.

Glazier obtained a copy of a secret sheriff's report which revealed that four children, playing in Tijeras Canyon arroyo, had found a rusted .22 caliber Ivor Johnson revolver within sight of where Velten's body had been discovered two months before.

The state police crime lab found blood on the barrel but couldn't identify it. The lab sent a written report to the district attorney's office saying either that Ivor Johnson or a weapon "with similar barrel characteristics" had fired the fatal bullets.

The crime lab report was dated May 21, the second day of the trial. Although the gun had been in the courtroom, the authorities continued to insist it was not the murder weapon.

One week after Glazier's gun story appeared, Cain flew to southern California to track down two of the young men and a pair of female visitors who had registered at the "murder motel" as "Mr. and Miss Butt."

The first person Cain sought was Terry Highhouse, a teenager who had been released from the Orange County Jail the previous month.

Cain cross-checked the addresses on bail receipts for recent traffic tickets issued to Highhouse's known friends. This led the reporter to a temporary "crash pad" in Mission Viejo occupied by a group of part-time cabin burglars and marijuana dealers.

After gaining their confidence, Cain was led to Highhouse who, in turn, led him to the others.

Another window was opened.

In her original statement to Detectives Caldelaria and Tena, Mrs. Weyer had named the Butt group. She described what they ate, the brands of beer they drank and their general conduct at the motel.

In her subsequent statements and trial testimony, she dropped all references to the Butt group and attributed those same details to the Vagos.

Which group was she really identifying?

The four young people—in taped interviews with The News—said that the details of Mrs. Weyer's trial testimony (except the part about the rape and murder) were actually things they had done, not the Vagos.

But the group had not arrived in Albuquerque until after Velten's body was discovered.

Three days after this revelation, Albuquerque City Patrolman James O. Boman told Glazier that Mrs. Weyer had repudiated her accusations against the Vagos prior to the trial.

When he informed the district attorney's staff, he said he was promptly taken off the case.

Boman shared a low regard many Albuquerque city officers voiced for the county law enforcement agency.

Although the sheriff's detectives had been able to trace Velten's movements to Feb. 1, Boman said they neglected such basic procedures as checking the postmarks on the victim's accumulated mail to get a closer fix on the last time he was home.

Boman said the detectives turned aside his suggestion that beer cans found in the apartment be checked for fingerprints.

Glazier, now working nearly a year after the fact, managed to trace Velten's movements through Feb. 4 by befriending the sister of the owner of a Chinese restaurant Velten frequented. She led him to another patron of the New Chinatown Cafe who recalled chatting with Velten during the broadcast of a Russian opera.

The station had aired the program twice: on Feb. 4, before the Feb. 8 date fixed for Velten's murder, and again on Feb. 10, when the bikers were already in custody in Oklahoma.

The patron had paid for his meal by check but couldn't locate the canceled check. He asked the bank to review its records but was told it would take several days. (Eventually, the Feb. 4 date was confirmed).

The News team kept up the pressure.

Simmons and Cain flew to Minnesota.

They told Mrs. Weyer about finding the Butt group, about the information from Shelly Fish and what Patrolman Boman had said.

Cain told her the case against the bikers was falling apart and that he thought the authorities were running for cover.

He said there was a chance Glazier would be able to prove through the canceled check that Velten was alive when she had said he was dead.

"If we prove he was alive," Cain argued, "who are they going to blame for putting the bikers on death row, themselves or you?"

She asked the newsmen to return when her husband got home from work, but before they could don their coats, she blurted out the story of falsely incriminating the Vagos. Cain had a tape recorder running under his sportcoat.

That evening, after Mrs. Weyer had told her husband about her false testimony, Cain and Simmons returned to the Weyer home. The four sat, with the tape recorder now openly visible on the dinner table.

Painstakingly, Mrs. Weyer detailed how detectives had threatened and tried to bribe her so that she would tell the story they wanted to hear.

She had been alone and depressed, she said. She had always assumed the bikers were guilty. Bowing to the insistent detectives, even taking the lead at times, "was something to do."

Mrs. Weyer said she had tried to repudiate her story prior to the trial both to Boman and others. Various county officials would later admit this in court. But each time she had tried, the detectives came down on her. Once, Assistant DA Gross ordered her arrested.

Gross later admitted this in court but said he didn't think the detectives in the room would take him seriously and actually book her, which they did.

Not once during the trial, she admitted, had she been able to look the bikers in the eyes. She wondered if they could forgive her.

Even the sensational "breast scars" were made by an ill-fitting bra, she said.

Mrs. Weyer told Simmons and Cain she had called the Albuquerque authorities several days before the reporters' visit to complain about Cain's phone calls. She apologized as the newsmen left.

After this story appeared, District Attorney Brandenburg seized on this complaint to charge The News had "unmercifully harassed" her and that her repudiation was a lie. He predicted she would never stick to it.

She did. Even though she was pregnant with her fifth child, Mrs. Weyer repeated the entire story in a sworn affidavit to the New Mexico Supreme Court.

She agreed to return to Albuquerque with her husband to repeat her repudiation in open court. She did this in the face of a Brandenburg threat to prosecute her for perjury if she deviated from her original trial testimony.

On still another trip to California, Glazier unearthed independent witnesses who further substantiated the Vagos' alibi—that they spent the murder day being anything but model citizens in a Los Angeles suburb.

Then last March, just as the pieces were falling into place, a monumental red herring dropped in the newsmen's laps.

A 24-year old homosexual, Eugene F. Greer, wrote Simmons from the New Mexico State Prison to say that a fellow inmate and former lover—L. D. Bickford—had bragged to him of committing several mutilation murders.

Greer said Bickford, already convicted of stabbing to death an Albuquerque hotel clerk, had boasted of murdering Velten, an aging Chicano in Carlsbad, N.M., a young cowboy in Phoenix, Ariz., and a fifth man somewhere in the east.

The News spent weeks on this promising—but false—lead.

Meanwhile, the bikers private defense attorneys—George Henry Farrah, Vince D'Angelo and L. Scott McCarty—were able to take Mrs. Weyer's affidavit and Bickford information to the New Mexico Supreme Court, where they won a full hearing on a new trial.

The hearing, last April 1, was conducted by Judge Riordan, the original trial judge, once an assistant to District Attorney Brandenburg. It centered on Mrs. Weyer's confession to The News.

Cain testified that neither he nor Simmons had intimidated or inappropriately influenced Mrs. Weyer.

When Brandenburg suggested intimidation took place before the formal interview with Mrs. Weyer's husband present, Cain produced the secret tape recording. It was played to a hushed courtroom.

Brandenburg claimed Mrs. Weyer's repudiation was improper because Cain had "lied" to her about the prosecutor's office "running for cover." Judge Riordan denied the motion for a new trial.

During a break in the hearing, one of Brandenburg's office workers had asked the DA—in Cain's presence—why Brandenburg didn't answer the reporter's "secret tape" with his pretrial recordings of Mrs. Weyer.

But it seemed the prosecuting attorney had his own reason for withholding his tapes. On one, she had repudiated her biker statements.

So, the Brandenburg tapes became the target of a second special appeal for a new trial, which also was denied.

The News team had reached the low point of its probe.

Glazier, Cain and Simmons had made some 10 trips to New Mexico, four to California, three to Minnesota, two to Arizona and one to Virginia. Glazier and Simmons had spent their own vacations following new leads in New Mexico.

Some 3,000 hours had been spent in the investigation at a cost of $50,000 to $75,000 in expenses and salaries. The newspaper could not recall exerting such an effort to preserve justice so far from its circulation area in its 102-year history.

The defense attorneys, who had received only token payment for their own monumental efforts, remained confident the appeals courts would ultimately free the bikers based on The News' evidence. There was little to do while awaiting the courts.

Simmons, meanwhile, retired from The News. Cain was diverted to other assignments. Glazier followed growingly weak leads.

The solution came out of the blue.

Last September, a 25-year-old drifter and ex-mental patient found God and decided to clear his conscience.

Kerry R. Lee, of Rome, Ga., walked into the North Charleston, S.C. police station on Sept. 19 and confessed to killing Velten in a narcotics sale dispute on Feb. 6, 1974.

Glazier was on the next plane to Charleston. There he met biker defense attorneys Farrah and D'Angelo.

Lee gave the attorneys a three page affidavit detailing the killing. The interview was witnessed by a South Carolina public defender who had tried to talk Lee out of incriminating himself.

Glazier then flew to Albuquerque to seek supportive evidence.

Brandenburg, the district attorney still insisting the bikers were guilty, refused to extradite Lee.

A new hearing was held in December before District Judge H. Vern Payne, with Lee appearing voluntarily.

An FBI agent testified that two bullets taken from Velten's head were an "absolute match" to the Ivor Johnson revolver found in the arroyo—the gun The News discovered had been withheld from the original trial.

William A. McCord, an Albuquerque resident, identified the gun as his. He and his daughter, Janet—who had dated Lee—declared Lee had stolen the revolver from McCord's gun cabinet before the murder.

Miss McCord testified Lee borrowed her car on the night of Feb. 5 and told her as he left he was on his way to pull a "dope ripoff." He telephoned later to say he had killed a man and returned to her home in the morning splattered with blood.

The borrowed car had gotten stuck in the arroyo not far from the murder scene. An Albuquerque patrolman testified he helped free such a car. A tow truck operator—with dated records to fix the time—identified Lee as the man waiting alongside the car he freed.

Miss McCord said Lee had taken her to the arroyo and showed her Velten's body.

Lee declared in his affidavit he had obtained a metal detector in a futile search for the discarded murder gun. It was confirmed by rental store records.

Although Lee "took the Fifth" when asked in court about the murder itself, his affidavit said two bullets struck Miss McCord's car during the struggle with Velten. The State Police found a bullet still lodged behind a fender.

Incredibly, the bullet was whole enough for the ballistics experts to make a positive match with the murder gun.

Under direct questioning by Judge Payne, New Mexico medical investigator Dr. James T. Weston admitted he erred in testifying at the original trial that Velten had been slashed with a heated knife. Weston also said he erred in testifying Velten had been sodomized.

The mounting evidence left Payne with no alternative. He ordered a new trial.

Dr. Weston's revised testimony brought the death row drama full circle.

It had been his contention that Velten was a homosexual which led the sheriff's detectives first to the gay bars, then to the motel, and finally to Judy Weyer.

It had been his testimony about the "heated knife" and alleged scars which Brandenburg repeatedly cited to "prove" Mrs. Weyer had to have been present at the killing.

On Dec. 15, District Judge Phillip Baiamonte dismissed the original indictment. At 4:40 p.m. Albuquerque time, Ronald B. Keine, Richard W. Greer, Clarence Smith Jr. and Thomas V. Gladish were freed.

What the bikers did now, the newsmen reasoned, was up to them. The time spent on death row may or may not have influenced their future lifestyle.

They show little bitterness, have cut their hair and shaved their beards. They look pale and haggard after their death row ordeal.

The News spent nearly 14 months resolving an injustice. It succeeded primarily because a newspaper could not walk away from four men thought to be innocent.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, the article that I just read sets forth in tremendous detail the horrors of the murder which took place in New Mexico to which I referred.

It was also a murder where four men were convicted by mistake through perjured testimony, spent 2 years on death row, and only as a result of some courageous newspaper reporters and a courageous news editor was their innocence ever established. It could never have been established had they been executed.

It is not a rare case. There are many cases in history where men and women have been put to death, where there was a mistake or error. There are many, many cases in history where in capital cases 20 or 30 years later innocence has been established where executions have taken place that never should have occurred.

One such example happened recently in England. Having a similar system of justice to our own in England, there are mistakes there as there are here as there are in every system of justice which is based on human beings.

We should follow the example of the British Parliament and reject this legislation to reinstitute the death penalty at the Federal level.

On July 13, 1983, the British House of Commons soundly defeated a proposal to reinstitute capital punishment in Great Britain. England, like the United States, has a judicial system which is not perfect. Indeed, documented cases of error, such as the miscarriage of justice which occurred in the famous Evans-Christie case, prompted many members of the British Parliament to vote for the abolition of the death penalty during the 1960's. Today, the risk of error still has a strong influence on the debate in England regarding whether to bring back the executioner. For example, in a speech in the House of Commons on July 13, 1983, Mr. Roy Jenkins said:

> In my two periods as Home Secretary I was concerned with at least 10 cases of capital conviction. There was not capital punishment in all of them. However, hanging took place in some of the 10 cases where the convictions were either clearly wrong or where there was a lingering flicker of doubt. There were only 186 capital convictions in the 20 years after the war when capital punishment existed, but the ratio of doubt to certainty was too high. The finality of the punishment is too great for certainty of human judgment. (Italic added.)

Similarly, Mr. Edward Heath urged the House of Commons to defeat the effort to reestablish capital punishment and stated:

> I come next to the point which in recent years I have found more and more worrying and more and more impressive. I refer to condemnation by mistake. I find it impossible to accept a penalty that is irreversible when it is so apparent that a number of mistakes have been made.

Mr. President, one of the most well-known cases of erroneous execution in Great Britain is that of Timothy John Evans—a man who was actually granted a posthumous pardon by Queen Elizabeth on July 29, 1967—approximately 15 years after he was executed for the murder of his infant daughter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the entire pardon of Queen Elizabeth of Timothy John Evans.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Following is text of pardon Elizabeth the Second by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, Northern Ireland and of our other realms and territories Queen head of the Commonwealth defencer of the faith to all to whom these presents shall come greeting:
> Whereas Timothy John Evans at the central criminal court on the thirteenth day of January 1950 was convicted of murder and sentenced to death now know ye that we on consideration of some circumstances humbly represented unto us are graciously pleased to extend our grace and mercy and to grant him our free pardon in respect of the said conviction: And we do hereby command all justices and others whom it may concern that they take due notice hereof.
>
> And for so doing this shall be a sufficient warrant.
> Given at our Court at St. James the eighteenth day of October 1966 in the fifteenth year of our reign.
>
> By Her Majestys command.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, one paragraph of that pardon, which is dated October 16, 1966, reads as follows:

> Whereas, Timothy John Evans, at the Central Criminal Court, on the 13th day of January 1950 was convicted of murder and sentenced to death; Now, know ye that we on consideration of some circumstances humbly represented unto us are graciously pleased to extend our grace and mercy and to grant him our free pardon and respect of said conviction.

That pardon came a bit late. Timothy John Evans was executed, and it could do him nor society no good when the Queen gave him a free pardon.

It was one of the reasons that Great Britain abolished capital punishment, after having executed people innocent of the crimes with which they were charged.

Great Britain abolished capital punishment after having executed a man innocent of the crime he was charged with. A British author, Ludovic Kennedy, undertook the difficult task of convincing the British Government that previous reports on the Evans case were hastily done and that Evans was actually innocent of the murder of his child. The Kennedy book, "Ten Rillington Place," set off a new wave of protest in England to the execution of Evans, which led to the eventual posthumous pardon of Evans.

There is an important message to Americans in the preface of Mr. Kennedy's book on the Evans case which states:

> The fate of Timothy Evans was terrible, but it is regrettably improbable that it was unique, either in the United Kingdom or the United States, in which latter country no week passes without at least one newspaper story about a prisoner who wins release because he has proved that he was illegally convicted, or because another man confesses to the crime for which the first had been imprisoned. Is it possible that only capital judgments are infallible? The laws of chance make it hard to believe.

There is an important message in the case of Timothy Evans to us as well as to Great Britian, and because of the importance of that case I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a Library of Congress study of the Evans-Christie cases and the abolition of capital punishment in Britian.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EVANS-CHRISTIE CASES AND THE ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN BRITAIN

Innocent men have been hanged in the past and will be hanged in the future unless either the death-penalty is abolished or the fallibility of human judgment is abolished and judges become supermen.[1]

Timothy John Evans, 25, truck driver, illiterate and mentally backward, was hanged on March 9, 1950 for the alleged murder of his infant daughter. He is now almost universally remembered as having been "convicted and hanged on a false case."[2] Evans had made several confessions to the police concerning the manner in which his wife and child had been killed. In one of these confessions he had accused another occupant of the house that he lived in, one John Christie, who Evans alleged had performed an operation for abortion on his wife. In a later confession Evans admitted that he had himself committed the killings. In the prosecution of Evans, under the rule that a person may be tried for one murder at a time, only the indictment relating to the murder of the daughter was proceeded with. However, the murder of the wife was always part of the prosecution's case. Evans was found guilty and his appeal that the evidence of the killing of his wife should not have been introduced into evidence was rejected.[3]

The prinicipal witness for the prosecution at Evans' trial was John Christie, his neighbor, against whom Evans had made and withdrawn an allegation of murder. In early 1953, three years after the execution of Evans, the bodies of six women were found in Christie's apartment and backyard. Included among the victims was Christie's wife. Some of the victims had been killed as long ago as 1943 and 1944. Christie confessed that he had strangled all the women for sexual purposes. He also admitted that he had strangled Mrs. Evans but denied having murdered her daughter.

The possibility of a miscarriage of justice caused great public disquiet and an official inquiry was instituted. The inquiry held in private by a Queen's Counsel concluded in a remarkably short period of one week that the case for the prosecution against Evans had been overwhelming and that Christie's claim that he had killed Mrs. Evans was unreliable and probably untrue. John Christie was hanged the day after the report was released.

Parliament debated the report and the Government was generally content in its view that justice had been done in the case. The impression, however, could not be erased that the inquiry was a cover-up. The coincidences in the case were too incredible for the public to believe that a mistake had not been made. An important question arose:

Would any jury have convicted Evans had they known that at the time of his trial two bodies were buried in the yard, strangled by the witness for the prosecution? Would any Home Secretary have dared to allow Evans to be hanged had he known the full circumstances? [4]

Those advocating the abolition of capital punishment gained important ammunition for their cause and pressed their arguments with greater force. The Christie case was a good example to show that capital punishment had no deterrent effect. Christie who has taken part in the trial of the hanged Evans was not deterred from killing again. Moreover, were it not for the execution of Evans, his fate would have been different after the revelation made by Christie.

The Evans and Christie cases were instrumental in changing the minds of many people, including legislators, who were formerly against the abolition of capital punishment. For example, the Home Secretary who approved Evans' execution stated the following in a debate on capital punishment:

I was the Home Secretary who wrote on Evans' papers, "The law must take its course." I never said, in 1948, that a mistake was impossible. I think Evans' case shows, in spite of all that has been done since, that a mistake was possible, and that, in the form in which the verdict was actually given on a particular case, a mistake was made. I hope that no future Home Secretary, while in office or after he had left office, will ever have to feel that although he did his best and no one could accuse him of being either careless or inefficient, he sent a man to the gallows who was not "Guilty as charged." [5]

The fate of Timothy Evans became an important symbol on the road which eventually led to the abolition of capital punishment in Britain. It was, however, the execution of a young woman for the murder of her lover which provided a telling and often quoted view against capital punishment. In a statement issued by a teacher who taught in a school close to the prison where the woman was executed, it was said:

Today Ruth Ellis was hanged. Not only myself but many of my colleagues were faced with the effect of this upon the boys and girls we teach.

The school was in a ferment. There were some children who had waited outside the prison gates; some claimed to have seen the execution from their windows; others spoke with a fascinated horror about the techniques of the hanging of a female.

My colleagues and I agree that if there is any argument which weights above all others for the abolition of capital punishment then it is this dreadful influence it had. For not only was Ruth Ellis hanged today, hundreds of children were a little corrupted. [6]

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues that Timothy John Evans actually confessed to having murdered his infant daughter—a crime he was later found to be innocent of committing. In fact, after Evans was executed, he was granted a posthumous pardon by Queen Elizabeth for the crime of murdering his infant daughter. Later in the debate, I will describe another case which occurred recently in the State of Missouri where a man accused of committing the brutal murder of a child actually confessed to a crime he never committed. That man, Melvin Lee Reynolds, is now free, but only because Charles Hatcher confessed to the same murder Reynolds had been convicted of committing in such detail that the police knew Hatcher, and not Reynolds, had actually killed the child. The point of these two examples is that even in those cases where the evidence seems clear-cut—indeed, even where the prosecution has a confession to murder—the risk of error is real.

Mr. President, there is a great deal of dispute, of course, on the question of the deterrent effect of capital punishment, the death penalty. Many people in law enforcement have reached a conclusion that it is not a deterrent.

One of the most notable of those people is the former warden of San Quentin Prison, Warden Quentin Duffy, who testified relative to capital punishment as follows:

Born and raised in the "Prison Town" of San Quentin, with all but a very few of my adult years in prison work, my presentation is on the practical experience I have had for over 32 years in handling adult offenders, both male and female, who have been condemned to death.

I have personally witnessed over 150 executions and have legally officiated at the execution of 88 men and 2 women. Prior to my appointment as Warden at San Quentin, I participated in 60 legal hangings. The 2 women were the first women executed in the State of California.

May I preface my presentation with a brief account of:

METHODS OF EXECUTIONS IN UNITED STATES

Hanging, whether the prisoner is dropped through a trap, after climbing the traditional 13 steps, or whether he is jerked from the floor after having been strapped, black capped and noosed, is a very gruesome method of execution which has been used for many years, and is still used in several states . . . When, on a nod from the Warden, the executioner signals the three men in the small enclosure on the gallows, and the officials cut the taut strings, one of these strings springs the trap, while the other two are attached to dummy ropes. This gives the three officers a "somewhat" clear conscience, projecting the actual springing of the trap on the other person. The day before an execution the prisoner goes through a harrowing experience of being weighed, measured for length of drop to assure breaking of the neck, the size of the neck, body measurements, etc. When the trap springs he dangles at the end of the rope. There are times when the neck has not been broken and the prisoner strangles to death. His eyes pop almost out of his head, his tongue swells and protrudes from his mouth, his neck is broken, and the rope many times takes large portions of skin and flesh from the side of the face that the noose is on. He urinates, he defecates, and droppings fall to the floor while witnesses look on, and at almost all executions one or more faint or have to be helped out of the witness room. The prisoner remains dangling from the end of the rope for 8 to 14 minutes before the doctor, who has climbed up a small ladder and listens to his heart beat with a stethescope, pronounces him dead. A prison guard stands at the feet of the hanged person and holds the body steady, because during the first few moments there is usually considerable struggling in an effort to breathe.

The legal witnesses are dismissed after having signed the usual witness forms. However, the body of the condemned is left hanging below the gallows for an additional 15 or 20 minutes. This is to assure those in charge that ample time has elapsed before cutting the rope in order to make certain of death.

The body is then placed in a prison-made casket and kept in the morgue until loved ones or friends claim the remains. Most bodies are claimed by relatives, loved ones or friends, and funeral services are conducted in many cases in chapels in their own hometown, or a member of the clergy arranges burial in a cemetary away from the prison.

Although I have seen several electric chairs, I have never witnessed an electrocution. Wardens and other noted penologists have told me that it is about as gruesome a procedure as hanging. The body has to be prepared beforehand for the fastening, and one of the pants legs split in order that an electric plate can be placed against the leg. When the executioner throws the switch that sends the electric current through the body, the prisoner cringes from torture, his flesh swells and his skin stretches to a point of breaking. He defecates, he urinates, his tongue swells and his eyes pop out. In some cases I have been told, the eyeball rests on the cheeks of the condemned. His flesh is burnt and smells of cooked meat. When the autopsy is performed the liver is so hot that doctors have said that it cannot be touched by the human hand. As in hanging, electrocution disfigures the body severely.

Prison morale is disrupted by the dimming of the lights throughout the institution when the switch is thrown the several times necessary to insure death.

In facing a firing squad several rifle shots are fired, and all but one are effective. As in the case of hanging and electrocution, shooting disfigures the body severely.

In administering death by lethal gas, from 89 personal experiences, I made the following observations:

With the exception of the death watch (which is used in all methods), there are no last hours of preparation of the body of the condemned. The prisoner is kept in a holding cell in a separate room for his last few hours—usually not more than 20 feet from the lethal gas chamber. He does not see the gas chamber until he enters it. A few moments before the scheduled hour a chaplain of his choice visits him. He is dressed in blue jeans and a white shirt. He is accompanied the 10 or 12 steps by two officers, quickly strapped in the metal chair, the stethescope applied, and the door sealed. The Warden gives the executioner the signal, and, out of sight of the witnesses, the executioner presses the lever that allows the cyanide eggs to mix with the distilled water and sulphuric acid. In a matter of seconds the prisoner is unconscious. At first there is extreme evidence of horror, pain, strangling. The eyes pop, they turn purple, they drool. It is a horrible sight, witnesses faint. It finally is as though he has gone to sleep. The body, however, is not disfigured or mutilated in any way.

It could be said that lethal gas executions are more humane. In all methods the person is, of course, dead. There are no humane ways to kill people. In lethal gas, however, the last preparations are not so grim. Lethal gas executions are a bit less nerve racking on the personnel than other methods, and the family of the condemned prisoner, his loved ones and the friends who claim the body do not go through as much of a harrowing experience when they claim a body that has not been mutilated. I have talked with hundreds of these folks and, although they are grief stricken, it is not quite so hard on them emotionally.

Throughout all of my over 32 years of prison work, as a youngster growing up in a prison town, as a young man living within a few yards of the shadows of the prison walls, I have always been against capital punishment. Prisoners have always been a part of my life. Murderers have worked in our home. As children, criminals of all types have been assigned to our gardens, repair and maintenance of buildings, and have attended to the needs around the grade school which I attended.

WRONG TO KILL

I base most of my belief that the Death Penalty is wrong on a simple understandable statement, that "It is Wrong To Kill". The murders that the men and women have committed, and have been sent to prison for, are 100 percent wrong. There is no valid reason for their act.

I believe it is also wrong that the State or Federal Government commit another premeditated murder. Two wrongs do not make a right.

DETERRENT

During my years at San Quentin I talked with every man, (and 2 women), that were committed to San Quentin Prison under the penalty of death. Many of these have been executed, others commuted to life imprisonment, some without possibility of parole. A few have had new trials or reversals. Some have died while serving their sentence within the prison walls. I found that 80 lifers died in prison in the 10 years surveyed.

I have personally asked every man, (and two women), if they gave any thought to the fact they might be executed should they commit a murder or crime that is covered by the death penalty. I have asked hundreds—yes, thousands of prisoners, who have committed homicides and who were not sentenced to death, whether or not they thought of the death penalty before the commission of their act. Their answer is invariably that they did not expect to get caught, that it was a crime of passion, jealousy, rage, temporary insanity.

I have interviewed and have asked the same question of thousands of robbers who have used a gun or other deadly weapon in the commission of their "Stick-up". They are, of course, potential murderers. They give similar answers.

I have, to date, not had one person say that they had ever thought of the death penalty prior to the commission of their crime.

I do not favor capital punishment because I do not believe it is a deterrent to crime. Statistics show that where it has been abolished, there is no noticeable difference in the number of homicides committed in like areas. In some states homicides are higher in capital punishment states, than in their neighboring abolition state. I believe that executions promote more similar crimes in the community. Many of us in prison work also know that there are more homicides following an execution than preceeding same.

NO EQUALITY

There is no equality in conviction and sentencing of those who commit murder. I have said often, and I repeat here—that I can take you into San Quentin Prison or to Sing Sing, Leavenworth or Atlanta Prisons, and I can pick out many prisoners in each institution serving life sentences or less, and I can prove that their crimes were just as atrocious, and sometimes much more so, than most of those men on the row. The verdict of death by lethal execution is, I believe, an emotional release by those who are hearing the case.

A PRIVILEGE OF THE POOR

I have never known a person of means to have been executed. If he has a competent attorney who develops the case, and who can play upon the emotions of the jury, he usually receives a lesser degree.

ERROR

There is always an element of the chance of error. It is true that the automatic appeal used in some states is a means of finding any errors. If an innocent person, however, is put to death and in later years the real murderer comes to light, it is too late to do anything about it. There have been many reversals by the State and Federal Courts. Many new trials ordered, lesser degrees administered, and Governors and Presidents have commuted many condemned inmates to a lesser degree than death.

EMOTIONS

People who come to our prison are, in most cases, emotionally, morally or mentally disturbed. I have known cases where men who have had to be executed when all they were able to answer were the legal answers to questions: "know the difference between right and wrong, the seriousness and quality of their act, and the penalty they were facing". They would otherwise be so mentally gone that their case was pitiful. Some would have to be lead to the gallows or the gas chamber, others dragged while screaming from mental fear.

INNOCENT

Although I have never personally known of an innocent person to have been executed, there is documented proof that this has happened a few times. It is of course, too late to do anything about it after the trap has been sprung.

VICTIMS

Often we are confronted with the statement: "How about the victims?" "How about their loved ones?"

Yes, we do think of the victims and of their loved ones. I have counseled with families of the victims. I have directed them, consoled them, wept with them and prayed with them. What has happended to their loved one is wrong! I repeat, two wrongs do not make a right.

We also think of the loved one of the condemned. They too suffer greatly. They have not committed any crime, but their grief is heavy.

COSTS

It costs more to execute than to send a person to prison to serve a full life sentence. This is proven by a survey made by a noted Penologist in the State of Illinois, (See Renewal, February 1, 1963), in which he states in part, "I found that thirty years of imprisonment cost the state about $45,000.00, assuming no cost-offsetting activity on the part of the prisoner. By way of comparison, the costs of a capital trial and appeals, special security handling in court and jail, and the long stay on Condemned Row, the rehearsals, and carrying out of an execution, were in excess of $60,000.00. Capital Punishment is by no means cheaper than life imprisonment, and the jurisdiction that maintains it, pays for it dearly in both money and human costs."

California's Administrator of Youth and Adult Corrections Agency, in an article in Federal Probation and Parole Magazine, June, 1964, wrote: "There is also the argument of cost. Why support some murderer for the rest of his life when we could execute him, and save all that money, the argument goes.

"Like so many arguments favoring the Death Penalty, this does not hold up under factual analysis. The actual cost of execution, the cost of operation, the super maximum Security Condemned Unit, the years spent by some inmates in condemned status, and a pro-rata share of top level prison officials, time spent in administering the unit, add up to a cost substantially greater than the cost to retain them in prison the rest of their lives."

And the former warden of San Quentin, Warden Duffy, continued in that statement by quoting a former Governor of California, Edmund G.

Brown, the father of the more recent Governor Brown:

EDMUND G. BROWN—FORMER GOVERNOR OF CALIFORNIA

I am unalterably opposed to capital punishment. It doesn't do a single, solitary bit of good and this has been proven time after time. As a matter of fact, it increases violence because when the state is guilty of a violent act it encourages the individual to be guilty of a violent act. This is seen by violence following a war or following an execution.

I hate to base this opinion on costs, but the cost of killing an individual is far, far greater than if we gave him life in prison. The expenses of a trial, the delay, the additional guards, the lawyers fees, the court fees, are far greater than if life in prison were the penalty.

I will do anything I can to see that capital punishment is abolished.

FOR OTHERS

When people who believe in the Death Penalty for all pre-meditated murders are faced with the question: "Would you want your son, daughter, your loved one executed if he committed a pre-meditated murder?" The answer is invariably "No!" It therefore, is obvious that it is good enough for someone else, but not good enough for me!

I have experienced several cases where people have said to me that all murderers should be executed. Then a member of their family is faced with execution, and they immediately do an about face and want their loved one saved.

ABOLISH

Our prison systems are set up on the concept that they must protect society and must work toward the rehabilitation of the offender. I believe that most prisoners, except for mental cases, can be changed for the better. A few will have to be kept under close confinement for the rest of their natural lives. Some must die in prison. Some lifers do die in prison. They have committed murder. They were not sentenced to death. Some who have been sentenced to death would fall into this category, others could be changed.

I personally believe that the Death Penalty should be abolished. We have ample facilities to keep offenders away from society for the rest of their lives if warranted.

When the Death Penalty is stricken from our statutes, and the gas chambers, the hangman's noose, the electric chair, and the firing squad are done away with, as the rack, the screw, burning at the stake, drowning, throwing to the lions, and other barbaric methods were, "we will all be the better for it."

The former prosecuting attorney of Wayne County, Mich., Bill Cahalan, has written a lengthy statement relative to capital punishment, a strong statement opposed to capital punishment, pointing out that it has not shown to be a deterrent and also pointing out that it is not enough to be against capital punishment and that we must support effective law enforcement which means those principles which lead to certainty of apprehension, conviction, and punishment.

I ask unanimous consent that his statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

(By William L. Cahalan)

The citizens of our society charge the Prosecuting Attorney with the responsibility of doing what he can to establish justice and insure domestic tranquility, and thus to bring about a society where we can live, work and play. Would capital punishment assist me—the prosecutor of the third largest county in the United States—in meeting that responsibility? Is capital punishment good for law enforcement? Will capital punishment help bring about a crime-free society? Will capital punishment contribute to the efficient administration of justice?

Most discussions of capital punishment begin with an analysis of whether or not it is a deterrent to crime. This is the wrong place to start. I, however, will start here so that we can get it out of the way. I am of the opinion that there is not sufficient evidence today to say with any certainty that capital punishment either does or does not deter crime. I have my doubts on whether or not we will ever have conclusive evidence. It is difficult if not impossible to prove a negative, particularly when it comes to human behavior. I doubt if we will ever know why a person commits a crime or does not commit a crime. I doubt whether or not the criminal knows himself.

Before discussing the pragmatic value of capital punishment I would like to share with you some of my thoughts on the moral issue.

I, like all sane people, abhor crime. In my job I have seen cases come across my desk which are so heinous that they make my blood run cold. I have seen the mutilated bodies of young victims of crime lying on the slabs in the morgue. I have talked and counseled at great length with widows of homicide victims. I have stood at the graveside time and time again with the mothers, fathers, young widows and small children of police officers shot down while performing their all-important and most honorable duty—protecting the lives and property of their fellow man. Yes, I abhor crime.

On the other hand, I respect human life. I know of nothing greater in all creation. I don't understand it. I don't know whence it comes or whither it goes. I am however, convinced of its sacredness. It is because of this that I oppose capital punishnment. Very simply stated, I respect human life more than I abhor any crime.

The citizens of 35 states have enacted laws calling for the death penalty. There must be compelling reason why our neighbors would ask that certain members of our society be hanged, electrocuted, shot or injected with a lethal substance.

I believe it is crime and the fear of crime—a most powerful force. It determines more than any other single factor where we live, where we work, where we send our children to school and where we seek recreation. It influences those judgments more than family, religion, education or cultural background. Every citizen in the United States fears crime and almost every citizen in the United States has been a victim of crime. Certainly these good citizens respect human life but they are soul sick with the fear of crime. And they might argue that life in the big city is really not human because of crime.

Fear of crime and the demand for capital punishment is a paradox. Society fears crime. It therefore enacts laws calling for capital punishment and capital punishment will have no effect upon the crimes that they fear the most. We are not as apt to be murdered nor do we fear murder as much as we fear rape, or the invasion of our home, or the mugging of our old folks, or the robbery of our person. These are the crimes that determine more than any other factor where we live, work, educate our children and play. In the City of Detroit in 1979 while there were 492 homicides, there were 1,369 rapes, 6,739 armed robberies, 3,555 robberies not armed, 1,119 attempted robberies, and 18,143 breaking and enterings of occupied dwellings. Yet, capital punishment will not effect these crimes. In fact, it will have a detrimental effect on our battle against these crimes by divering society's attention, by making the citizens think that they have done something about crime when in fact they have not.

We don't execute the rapist, the mugger, the hold-up man or the burglar. We execute the murderer and we seldom do that. Less than one percent of the murderers in those states that have capital punishment have been sentenced to die. (Of 204 homicides committed in Philadelphia in 1970, 170 perosns were arrested, charged and convicted. Three received the death penalty, fourteen got life sentences, 100 received sentences of two years or less and 48 were placed on probation.)

Of the over 31,000 serious crimes committed in Detroit last year, only 5, people at the most would have been executed if we had capital punishment in Michigan.

Not only would capital punishment divert our attention from more effective law enforcement, but it would divert our resources. One resource of which we are in very short supply is money, and capital cases require a great deal of it. "One capital trial in Georgia cost three-quarters of the county's tax revenue for the year. When the State of Iowa recently had to hire a special prosecutor to conduct a capital trial it cost $210,000. Even if the original trial is a perfunctory affair, subsequent appeals will be long and costly. A case that goes all the way to execution will probably have a dozen lengthy court hearings after conviction. In almost every case the state must foot the bill for the defense attorneys, not to mention the time required of prosecutors, court reporters, and judges. For every case that results in an execution, a dozen others will have been dropped after several rounds of expensive litigation." Stephen H. Gettinger, "Sentenced to Die", MacMillian, 1979.

As a practical matter, executing a very few murderers will not assist me in my responsibilities as prosecutor to help establish justice and insure domestic tranquility. If anything, it will be a hindrance.

If I stopped here I would not be faithful to my oath of office. It is not enough to be against capital punishment. We must address the hard issue of what is to be done about crime and the fear of crime. A woman who sees her convicted rapist walk out of court, an elderly person who meets her convicted mugger on the street the day after his sentence, the home owner who is continually confronted by the convicted burglar who has received probation must be heard when they say "okay, don't execute but do something."

We must insure that the opportunity to share fully in the fruits of this society is open to all; but we must as surely guarantee that for those who choose to live by a life of crime a sanction will be imposed. Without certainty of punishment for criminal behavior, we can expect to deal annually with the anguished cries of crime victims for more and more severe penalties.

It is not enough to be against capital punishment. We must support effective law enforcement which means those principles which lead to certainty of apprehension, conviction, and punishment.

The imposition of clear and certain sanctions for earlier crime will obviate the perceived need for the most severe sanction for the later crime.

I live, work, and play in the City of Detroit. I know that its full renaissance will not have been generated until its environment is more nearly free of crime. I am opposed to capital punishment on moral grounds alone, but I know from thirteen years in my present job that for pragmatic reasons it is not only no solution, it is counter-productive. But insight based on my experience will not still outraged cries from victims. You must help this city and county move closer to the goal of a crime-free environment. When that occurs, the argument over capital punishment will have been won.

Mr. President, the president of the Police Foundation, former Police Commissioner Pat Murphy, opposes the death penalty, saying that he does not believe that it does have a significant effect on crime.

We have received literally dozens of letters from law enforcement officials, police chiefs, prosecutors across the country opposing the death penalty, saying that they have seen the error that is possible.

In the words of the deputy chief of police in Bloomfield, Conn., Anthony Toce:

I have seen the fallacy of eye-witness identification on too numerous occasions to even mention. Many times I have seen a witness or group of witnesses swear to identification via photographs or line-ups; only to find later that the accused could not have possibly been the culprit.

The Supreme Court Justice Burton Roberts, of the Supreme Court of the State of New York wrote as follows:

Our criminal justice system is fallible. Capital punishment is irreversible. The possibility of a mistake exists. If the state ever executed the wrong man, then all of the citizens of that state would be murderers.

The commissioner of public safety in the city of Troy, N.Y., has written that: "The death penalty is not a so-called solution to the problem of violent death. Rather, it creates a false sense of safety unrelated to the reality."

He wrote:

As the discussion about the restoration of the death penalty resumes, I urge you to reject the concept that the State can or should perform the most heinous form a murder—that of killing with premeditation. I urge you to reject the concept that we are so poor, so ignorant and so frightened that we cannot better serve our people by convicting, securing and studying the violent predators among us. By murdering the murderer, we discard our only means of understanding better why some people kill. The destruction of the diseased binds us forever to a future of ignorance and violence.

The superintendent of the downstate correctional facility in New York says:

The death penalty is too drastic to use when we are uncertain as to its deterrent effect.

I have been active in criminal justice since 1950. There are many competent and dedicated people in the field but we are humans. Mistakes are made. Occasionally an innocent person is sent to prison. The death penalty leaves no room for error.

Finally, in this regard, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement of an organization of law enforcement officials that is entitled "Law Enforcement Against Death," a statement which eloquently opposes the imposition of the death penalty be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY LAW ENFORCEMENT AGAINST DEATH (LEAD)

We are living in the most difficult and dangerous times—a time of extraordinary political, social and economic uncertainty; a time when many of our hopes and dreams of the '60s have been dissipated as we enter the '80s; a time when the American people feel dispirited, frustrated, angry and powerless.

And, nowhere is the bitter public mood better reflected than in vengeful calls for the restoration of the death penalty. In 1972, the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that the death penalty in this country violated the Eighth Amendment of the Constitution which prohibits "cruel and unusual punishment." In 1977, the Supreme Court backtracked on its original decision and held that the states may impose the death penalty under certain conditions. With the country's continuing turn to the right in the last election, there is increasing momentum for congressional action in this area. Senator STROM THURMOND (R-S.C.), the new Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has already pledged to seek a death penalty law. And, the supreme irony can be found in President-elect Ronald Reagan's position on the issue. A man who desires the least amount of federal intrusion into our lives would grant the government the ultimate power to take a human life.

Thirty-five states now have death penalty statutes on the books; four of them using gallows as a method of execution. There are over 700 men and women across the nation living on death row.

As members of the law enforcement and criminal justice profession, we wish to express our concern about the destructive climate of hatred eating away at the nation's social fabric.

We wish to express our strong opposition to the use of the death penalty which amounts to a fraudulent hoax on the American people—pandering to our baser instincts, while perpetuating the myth that capital punishment is a cure-all for crime.

And above all, speaking from our own experience as lawmen, we wish to emphasize that the death penalty remains a totally ineffective weapon as a crime-prevention tool.

In recognition of these sentiments, we announce the formation of Law Enforcement Against Death (LEAD)—a national organization comprised of distinguished law enforcement officials and experts on criminal justice from 14 states, all of whom are pledged to educate the public and work against the use of the death penalty.

We are in agreement with those who argue that capital punishment is immoral, inhuman, and discriminatory.

Capital punishment is a barbaric practice which has no place in a civilized society. It is a throwback to the earliest days of penology when slavery, branding and other corporal punishments were the rule.

Capital punishment works in favor for the worst and most dangerous criminals who are rarely executed. In practice, it further discriminates against members of racial minorities, the poor and the uneducated.

Capital punishment diverts attention from more effective law enforcement. The vast percentage of crime—more than 99 percent—involves muggers, holdup men, burglars and rapists. By making citizens think that they have done something about crime, capital punishment diverts our attention and resources away from the largest battle against crime.

Capital punishment flies in the face of an international trend toward abolition. Except for France and Spain, no other country in western Europe has invoked the death penalty in the past decade. Even in The People's Republic of China, individuals sentenced to death have several years in which to make some sort of restitution and thus avoid execution.

But strictly from a law enforcement standpoint, an area of special concern to us, the issue involving the death penalty as a deterrent to capital crime, is absolutely critical. And wishful-thinking to the contrary, the overwhelming body of evidence accumulated thus far suggests the death penalty is no more effective than imprisonment in deterring crime and, in fact, may even increase the likelihood of criminal violence.

The following points should be emphasized:

(1) When the death penalty is employed in a given state, there is no decrease in the subsequent rate of criminal homicide in that state. For example, in Philadelphia during the '40s, there were as many murders after highly publicized executions as before.

(2) The imposition of the death penalty in a given state may actually increase the subsequent rate of criminal homicide in that state. In California, between 1946-55, the amount of homicide tended to increase in the days immediately prior to an execution. Indeed, in a study published in the October 1980 issue of The Journal of Crime and Delinquency, William Bowers and Glenn Pierce of Northeastern University's Center for Applied Social Research find evidence of "a brutalizing effect" of capital punishment. Using statistics from the state of New York between 1907-63, the authors found there were, on the average, two additional homicides in the month after an execution.

(3) States which abolish the death penalty do not show an increase of criminal homicide after abolition. In addition, states which have reinstated the death penalty after abolishing it have not shown a reduced rate of criminal homicide. And, death-penalty states as a group do not have lower rates of criminal homicide than non-death penalty states.

(4) Police officers on duty are not subject to a higher rate of criminal assault and homicide in states that have abolished the death penalty than they do in death penalty states. Similarly, prisoners and prison personnel do not experience a higher rate of criminal assault and homicide from lifeterm prisoners in abolition states than they do in death penalty states.

If the considerable body of research showed that the imposition of the death penalty had a demonstrable effect on homicide, such findings might give us considerable pause for thought. But such is not the case.

Despite the emotionalism surrounding the issue, the eye-for-an-eye philosophy espoused by expedient politicians and the misguided thinking by well-meaning citizens, the overwhelming evidence shows that the death penalty is ineffective, impractical, if not counterproductive. Indeed, it serves no real purpose other than to quench our appetites for bloodthirsty revenge.

Our history books are loaded with details of brutality practiced by the government in the name of protecting society. We need no new chapters.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, some time ago I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a May 12, 1983, Washington Post article about a man named Isidore Zimmerman, a man who spent 25 years in prison for a crime he never committed.

Two hours before Mr. Zimmerman was scheduled to die in the State of New York's electric chair, then Governor Lehman commuted his sentence to life in prison. If Zimmerman had not received his commutation from the Governor of New York, he would have died.

It was a quirk of fate which saved him so that he could walk out of prison decades later when the original indictment against him was finally dismissed by the Supreme Court of New York. New evidence in the Zimmerman case has revealed that eyewitnesses who were key to the prosecution had made statements before the trial that Zimmerman was completely innocent of the murder charge. These same witnesses later changed their story and testified against Zimmerman, but the prosecutor withheld information about their conflicting stories from Zimmerman's defense attorney during the original trial.

Chief Judge Charles Desmond wrote in his opinion dismissing the indictment against Mr. Zimmerman that:

The failure of the prosecutor to correct this falsehood and to afford counsel an opportunity to examine those statements, which were in his possession, in effect amounted to a suppression of such material and prejudiced the defendant in his right to a fair trial.

I would like to at this time, Mr. President, read from newspaper articles which have appeared in the Washington Post on the Zimmerman case, as well as an article which appeared in the Empire State Report in February 1983.

This article was entitled "In the Death House," and was written by Bob Keeler and reprinted in the Empire State Report.

The ghosts lingered in the cellblocks and the hallways, and Isidore Zimmerman quickly realized that he had made a mistake returning, after almost 44 years, to the death row at Ossining.

It was a cloudy day, with the rain falling periodically outside the squat brick building in the southwest corner of the Ossining Correctional Facility. Zimmerman was visiting the old Sing Sing death house—now used primarily for storage—accompanied by a reporter for a chain of German newspapers. Zimmerman was a hot ticket, because a judge's ruling in November 1982 made it look very likely that the state of New York is going to end up paying him a lot of money to make up for the quarter of a century that he spent in state prisons for a crime he didn't commit.

But Izzy Zimmerman wasn't thinking about the money, or the two books he has written about his experiences, or the movie offers. He was thinking about the 13 men who had been killed by the State of New York during the nine months that he lived on death row in 1938 and early 1939. Four of those men he considered totally innocent.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of this report in the Empire State Report magazine be printed in the RECORD, in full, as well as an article from the Washington Post relative to the Zimmerman case which indicates that there is a capital case a totally innocent man was convicted of a crime which he did not commit.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE DEATH HOUSE

(By Bob Keeler)

The ghosts lingered in the cellblocks and the hallways, and Isidore Zimmerman quickly realized that he had made a mistake returning, after almost 44 years, to the death row at Ossining.

It was a cloudy day, with the rain falling periodically outside the squat brick building in the southwest corner of the Ossining Correctional Facility. Zimmerman was visiting the old Sing Sing death house—now used primarily for storage—accompanied by a reporter for a chain of German newspapers. Zimmerman was a hot ticket, because a judge's ruling in November 1982 made it look very likely that the State of New York is going to end up paying him a lot of money to make up for the quarter of a century that he spent in state prisons for a crime he didn't commit.

But Izzy Zimmerman wasn't thinking about the money, or the two books he has written about his experiences, or the movie offers. He was thinking about the 13 men who has been killed by the State of New York during the nine months that he lived on death row in 1938 and early 1939. Four of those men he considered totally innocent.

"Oh boy, I tell you, I'm sorry I went," Zimmerman says in his thick New York accent. "I saw ghosts galloping up and down the corridors. I went into the death chamber and, to my mind, I literally saw these people again. They were talking to me. They wanted to know why I wasn't with them. I said: 'I'm innocent. I was talking back to them.

"Then the sergeant—I guess it was a real joke to him—he locked me in the cell that I was posing in. He locked the door on me and I really yelled at him. I was so mad. Then, when I went to the execution chamber proper, the guy says: 'Well, better late than never. You finally made it.' I said: 'That's not funny.' They have a macabre sense of humor."

Zimmerman got to death row in 1938, the New York State Court of Appeals later ruled, because key witnesses against him were telling very big lies at his trial. The Manhattan assistant district attorney who prosecuted him knew about the lies, the Court of Appeals ruled, but he didn't tell the trial court about it. So Izzy Zimmerman, on the verge of admission to Columbia University on a football scholarship, dreaming of a career as a lawyer, found himself convicted of murder in a Lower East Side robbery that left a New York City police officer dead.

"To our knowledge, as of this day, it's the longest recorded case of wrongful imprisonment in history," says Fred Fabricant of the Manhattan firm of Shea & Gould, Zimmerman's lawyer. "The closest one I've been able to find is 17 years. I've had a paralegal researching every wrongful imprisonment case that we can find. We haven't been able to find any published opinion anywhere in the world of a longer case of wrongful imprisonment where the person was absolutely exonerated. And when you add in the death row experience, that just makes it worse."

Tom Stoddard, legislative counsel to the New York Civil Liberties Union, agreed: "It is hard to imagine a worse set of facts."

FALSE TESTIMONY

It is clear that the 19-year-old Zimmerman was not even at the after-hours club on the Lower East Side in which Patrolman Michael J. Foley was killed during a robbery on April 10, 1937. His alleged role was to have provided the robbers with the gun they used. At the trial, the most damaging information came from Danny Rose and a second high school acquaintance named Harry Cooperman. They acknowledged that they had given the gun to the killers, but they added that Zimmerman gave it to them.

Both Rose and Cooperman were testifying under immunity, and neither one of them went to prison. But nearly 20 years later, at a coram nobis hearing, (a post-trial procedure to determine whether the conviction was wrongfully obtained) in 1956. Zimmerman's lawyers produced three sworn statements by Rose—made before the trial and before he was granted immunity—in which he said that Zimmerman had nothing to do with the murders. At the trial, though, when Zimmerman's lawyer asked Rose if he had made previous statements exonerating Zimmerman, Rose denied making any such statements.

"That was perjured testimony which the DA saw and used." Fabricant says. "He had an obligation to bring it to the court's attention. So it was real affirmative wrongdoing." In other words, not only did Assistant District Attorney Jacob Rosenblum fail to tell the court about Rose's previous statements, he sat mum when Rose perjured himself. Why?

"I think what motivated them was really what motivated Tom Dewey," Fabricant says, "because Tom Dewey was the DA of New York County at the time. He had a tabulation of how many murder convictions he was getting on his road to the governorship, and this was five boys on trial for murder."

But if the DA was interested only in numbers, why let Rose and Cooperman off the hook completely just to get Zimmerman? Why trade two for one if you're interested in statistics? "I guess the only answer, we have, to this day, is because Zimmerman screwed them," Fabricant says.

The story of how Zimmerman angered authorities goes back to the time he was in a holding tank for questioning, just after the robbery. While he was there, the jailers put a defendant named Lawrence Sullivan in with him. Sullivan had been badly beaten, and he told Zimmerman that the police had done it.

Fabricant says: "They called Izzy out and they said: 'Do you want to go home?' And he said: 'You bet.' They said: 'You can go right now. We just want you to do us one favor.' Izzy said: 'What's the favor?' They said: 'Well, we put this guy in your cell by the name of Sullivan.' Izzy said: 'Yeah?' They said: 'Well, listen, you're going to be called to testify, probably under subpoena by the defense counsel. When you're called, we want you to say you beat him up.' Izzy said: 'I can't do that.' They said: 'Okay, you can go home now. You remember that, and if you don't do it, we're going to get you.' Izzy was let go and he went home. Then he was called to testify and he testified that he did not beat him up, and back in he went."

At the trial, Zimmerman and four others were convicted of first degree murder and sentenced to die.

SENTENCE COMMUTED

On January 26, 1939, Zimmerman, like the others, had his hair trimmed and his trousers slit, ready for the electrodes. He had eaten his last meal, including steak and ice cream, and smoked a tremendously big cigar. At about 8:45 PM he was in the visiting cage at the death house, trying to console his father and two brothers as they came to the end of the last visit, with just over two hours to go until the execution. Just then, a deputy warden came to the visiting cage.

"He came to the door," Zimmerman remembers, "and he said: 'Mr. Zimmerman.' I said: 'Yes, what is it?' He said: 'You're not going to die tonight.' I said: 'Who said so? I want to die tonight.' By this time, I was ready for death. And he said: 'The Governor (Herbert Lehman) has said so.' I said: 'You call him and tell him that I want to die tonight. I don't want a commutation. I don't want to spend the rest of my life in prison for a crime I didn't commit.' He said: 'You will have nothing to say about it.'"

The deputy warden was right. Zimmerman had nothing to say about it, and he spent a good part of the rest of his life in prison. Three of the co-defendants died that night in the electric chair, and Zimmerman and Philip Chaleff had their sentences commuted. Over the next quarter of a century, the injustice of it all made Zimmerman anything but a model prisoner. "The bitterness that one would inevitably have from this kind of experience led him to act out a lot," Stoddard says. "I don't think I would have survived the experiences he did."

But Zimmerman survived, and in 1956, the suppressed Danny Rose statements surfaced at the coram nobis hearings. Nonetheless, he lost the battle in the Court of General Sessions and again in the Appellate Division. Only in 1962, with the Court of Appeals decision, did he finally get out.

But his bad luck held.

ZIMMERMAN SUES

First, he tried to sue the City of New York—Jacob Rosenblum's employer. He lost. Then he wanted to sue the State of New York, but found that the Court of Claims law didn't give him jurisdiction. So he went to the Legislature, which four times passed bills allowing him to sue the state. Three were vetoed by Nelson Rockfeller and one by Malcom Wilson. Finally, in 1981, after Zimmerman had become a public figure by lobbying the Legislature against the death penalty, Hugh Carey signed a bill allowing him to sue.

Despite his role as defender of the people from law suits, Attorney General Robert Abrams had been so impressed by the magnitude of the injustice that he advised Carey to sign the bill.

"We were in a very difficult position," says Richard Rifkin, deputy first assistant attorney general, whose involvement in the case alone is evidence of Abrams' interest. On one hand, the attorney general's job is to defend the people of the state against law suits. On the other hand, he has to advise the governor honestly on bills. "We have a lot of different responsibilities in this office," Rifkin says. "This is not unusual, in the sense that there are conflicts . . . Given the facts of this case, we felt that at least Mr. Zimmerman ought to have a court hear his claim."

Once the claim was filed, there was little doubt of the outcome. "These facts are all really indisputable," Rifkin says.

On November 5, Court of Claims Judge Adolph Orlando in Manhattan granted "partial summary judgment on the question of liability only." That means the only thing left to be determined is how much money Izzy Zimmerman gets. "When you throw out to anybody, especially laymen, How do you compensate this man; the answer is 'You can't,'" Fabricant says. But Zimmerman is asking for $10 million.

And what will he do if he gets it? Izzy Zimmerman has plenty of time to think about it these days. he had been making his living as a doorman in Manhattan until he became ill last year, but now the case is his only work. He lives in a two-bedroom Jackson Heights apartment with his wife, Ruth, the childhood friend who married him two years after he got out of prison, and his cat, Kerry.

"We plan to start a foundation in the name of my mother and father," Zimmerman says. "The purpose of that is to correct miscarriages of justice, such as people on death row. I did a show about two years ago with Phil Donahue in which there were four other guys who came directly from the death house. If these guys were so easily found, how about the ones that we haven't heard from? So we plan on starting a foundation. If a guy's innocent, we plan on helping him."

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that an interview by Phil Donahue with three men who had been convicted of serious crimes that they never committed be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the interview was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHIL DONAHUE. Good morning, Jane. The system does not always work. It didn't work for Larry Smith. Larry Smith served five years in the Ohio state penal system for a murder he did not commit. He was sentenced to prison for the rest of his natural life. The details, just the highlights of this incident, include the death, the shooting death of an alleged drug dealer in the Arkon, Ohio, Area. The drug dealer's girlfriend escaped the shootout, later drew a sketch of the alleged murderer for police. The sketch, that of a white male, was passed around the neighborhood, so to speak. Somebody said "that looks like Larry Smith." They hauled Larry Smith into a lineup, and the girl picked him out of the lineup and said that's the man.

Smith, protesting continually his innocence, asked to take a lie test. That may have been his first mistake. He flunked the lie test. I assumed you'll never take another lie test.

LARRY SMITH. No.

DONAHUE. O.K. You served five years in prison, and what turned it around for you?

SMITH. A Sergeant Grayshock(?) from Akron, Ohio, from the sheriff's department reopened the case. He went to Texas and got confessions from a husband and wife that was involved in the slaying and they were polygraphed. They both passed polygraphs. He got two more people to confess to their involvement in it, plus the guy that did the murder admitted it to another police officer, and they got me a new trial.

DONAHUE. At which time you were found innocent.

SMITH. Yes.

DONAHUE. Did you get any money for serving time? Did you get any compensation?

SMITH. Two hundred and thirty dollars.

DONAHUE. And your wife divorced you while you were in prison. Also here is Larry Hicks, who in 1978 was accused of a double murder. Telling this in a very short way, you helped two men load furniture in a truck for transfer to another residence. You noticed during the time that they were drinking and there was some conflict between the two. There were also two women standing by who were involved with these men. You helped them and then you left. Apparently, sometime after you left, the fight ensued, and these two men were stabbed to death.

LARRY HICKS. Right.

DONAHUE. The two women said you did it.

HICKS. Right.

DONAHUE. Did you take a lie test?

HICKS. Not right then. I took one later on.

DONAHUE. How did you do on the lie test?

HICKS. I took two lie detector tests, and I beat them both.

DONAHUE. And you kept saying I didn't do this, I didn't do this?

HICKS. Right.

DONAHUE. And they said?

HICKS. That I did. They kept saying I did do it, and I kept saying I didn't do it.

DONAHUE. And you actually went to death row, did you?

HICKS. Right.

DONAHUE. You were how close to execution.

HICKS. Two weeks.

DONAHUE. Two weeks? What happened?

HICKS. Well, within that two weeks, J.S. Kembro, he called me back to the county, it was Layte County, and he granted me a new trial.

DONAHUE. And in that second trial, you were found?

HICKS. Not guilty. I was found—I got acquitted the second trial.

DONAHUE. Is it your feeling that there are other guys in there just like you who got railroaded?

HICKS. Oh, yes, definitely, most definitely.

DONAHUE. And when they say I'm innocent, the authority looks at'em and says that's what they all say.

HICKS. That's what the authorities say. "That's what they all say."

DONAHUE. Isadore Zimmerman, in 1937, was arrested and subsequently convicted by a New York City police officer. And, you served how many years?

ISADORE ZIMMERMAN. Twenty-four years and eight months.

DONAHUE. You were how old at the time of this incident?

ZIMMERMAN. Eighteen years old.

DONAHUE. And you didn't do it.

ZIMMERMAN. I didn't kill anybody. The only involvement they said I had was loaning a gun to somebody. I had the incredibly bad luck to find two characters—one had loaned his coat and hat to someone else. I carried the hat and coat from one to the other, forgot the entire incident. Two months later, well, a detective was killed in a holdup. These two characters remembering that I had carried his hat and coat, decided that they could shift some of the responsibility on my shoulders, that perhaps it would be better for them, so they involved me by saying there was a gun in the coat. Actually, there was not, but they locked me in the Tombs where I had some more incredibly bad luck. A man was placed in the Tombs with me.

DONAHUE. The Tombs meaning the prison.

ZIMMERMAN. Meaning the county prison. And, there, he had been the victim of a brutal beating. I nursed him and took care of him to the best of my ability. Several months later, the district attorney said to me, asked me if I wanted to go home. I says, sure, I want to go home. I didn't do anything. He says I'm convinced of that. All I want you to do is testify that if your cellmate had any bruises on his body that you inflicted them during your fight. I said I would not perjure myself for him or anyone else. Nineteen years later, I first found out that the district attorney had brought these witnesses to his office and told them this is what I want you to say about Isadore Zimmerman. He deliberately framed me, and I wound up on death row for nine months, two hours away from my date of execution, but then Governor Lehman commuted my sentence.

DONAHUE. Your head was shaved?

ZIMMERMAN. My head was shaved. My leg was shaved. I was prepared to die. As a matter of fact, I had written to the governor, asking him to die, because I didn't want to spend the rest of my life in prison for a crime I never committed.

DONAHUE. You were—the murder happened in '37. You were immediately incarcerated. And, you were freed in what year, Izzy?

ZIMMERMAN. 1962.

DONAHUE. What was it that resulted in your being released?

ZIMMERMAN. The same witnesses now came forth and didn't perjure themselves at the instigation of the District Attorney. They finally told the truth. And, mind you, their testimony had helped send four men to the electric chair.

DONAHUE. You're also kind of a lobbyist now in a way. You're your own political rabble rowser. What are you doing?

ZIMMERMAN. I am the unofficial spokesman against the death penalty.

DONAHUE. And you also feel that the state of New York should compensate those who were wrongly jailed, is that right?

ZIMMERMAN. Yes, especially me, because I did twenty-five years for a crime I never committed. As a matter of fact, I have a bill up now, and I'd like some of your viewers to write to the Governor if they feel that I was wrongfully imprisoned. All they have to say is that they're in favor of it.

DONAHUE. Some kind of compensation for those who are wrongly convicted.

ZIMMERMAN. Yes.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the New York Times of June 1, 1983, headlined "$1 Million Is Awarded To Man Wrongly Imprisoned 24 Years" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

$1 MILLION IS AWARDED TO MAN WRONGLY IMPRISONED 24 YEARS

(By E. R. Shipp)

A Queens man who spent 24 years in New York prisons for a murder state officials have since conceded he did not commit was awarded $1 million in compensation yesterday by the State Court of Claims.

But the man, Isidore Zimmerman, who came within hours in 1939 of being executed, said he was "very unhappy" that the judge, Joseph Modugno, rejected his claim for $10 million.

"I should have gotten much more because what I sacrificed can never be replaced," said Mr. Zimmerman, a 66-year-old retired doorman.

NO CAREER AND NO CHILDREN

He said that several members of his family had died before he was able to clear his name, that he had not been able to pursue a career, that his health had suffered and that he had had no children.

In a 10-page decision, Judge Modugno noted that Mr. Zimmerman "testified in detail as to his sufferings, his severe beatings and long periods of solitary confinement in 'strip cells' where he was kept on a diet of bread and water in a room with limited sleeping and toilet facilities."

The judge concluded: "Based on all the evidence in the record and 120 exhibits, the court has determined that an award in the sum of $1 million would be fair and reasonable."

This, he said, is sufficient to cover all claims, "including loss of earnings, medical expenses, loss of liberty and civil rights, loss of reputation and mental anguish."

Both Mr. Zimmerman and the state gave indications that there might not be an appeal. The two sides have 30 days to decide.

Mr. Zimmerman's lawyer, Alfred Fabricant, noted that if he appealed, there was the chance the award would be reduced. Mr. Zimmerman, who is in poor health, also indicated he needed money now.

"I have no means to live on anymore," he said.

David M. Fishlow, a spokesman for Attorney General Robert Abrams, pointed out that Mr. Abrams had pushed for the legislation that made it possible for Mr. Zimmerman to sue the state.

"The only issue was the amount of the state's liability," Mr. Fishlow said. "He asked for $10 million. Attorney General Abrams, on behalf of the state, felt that was excessive."

In 1937, Mr. Zimmerman, then 20, was one of seven young men charged with taking part in the robbery of a Lower East Side restaurant during which a police officer was killed. Convicted of first-degree murder, he spent nine months on death row. Two hours before he was scheduled to be executed, Gov. Herbert H. Lehman commuted the sentence to life in prison.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, on July 19, 1977, Governor Dukakis of Massachusetts:

Declaring that the "stigma and disgrace" attached by history to the names of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, their families, and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should be "forevermore removed."

Sacco and Vanzetti were executed in the State of Massachusetts for the murders of two men nearly a half a century before Governor Dukakis declared them to be victims of an error of justice. Governor Dukakis proclaimed that the miscarriage of justice had occurred when Sacco and Vanzetti were executed. Their trial was, in his words, "permeated by prejudice against foreigners and hostility toward unorthodox views."

The belief that Sacco and Vanzetti were innocent is held by many because of the use of misleading evidence during the trial and the prosecution's failure to present exculpatory evidence. The judge who presided over the trial openly displayed biased opinions concerning the case and the prosecutor played upon the jurors' prejudices and emotions, and his repeated calls for patriotism.

In his report on Sacco and Vanzetti, a number of abuses were identified by Governor Dukakis, including making use of false evidence, making use of unfair and misleading evidence, withholding exculpatory evidence, and appealing to the jury's prejudices and biases.

The proclamation of the Governor of Massachusetts in part reads as follows:

The people of Massachusetts today take pride in the strength and vitality of their governmental institutions, particularly in the high quality of their legal systems; and

They recognize that all human institutions are imperfect, that the possibility of injustice is ever-present, and that the acknowledgment of fault, combined with a resolve to do better, are signs of strength in a free society; and

The trial and execution of Sacco and Vanzetti should serve to remind all civilized people of the constant need to guard against our susceptibility to prejudice, our intolerance of unorthodox ideas, and our failure to defend the rights of persons who are looked upon as strangers in our midst.

Mr. President, it took nearly a half century for the State of Massachusetts to rectify the wrong which occurred in the Sacco and Vanzetti case. I suspect that more often than not, these errors are never revealed or are never recognized by the State. There are several reasons why it is difficult to exonerate defendants in such cases. First, since the person is dead, the incentive to rectify the wrong is almost nil. Unless a family member, dedicated attorney, or some other person takes up the cause, the question of guilt dies with the accused.

In addition, even where there is substantial evidence of an error of justice, it is difficult for the State to admit that an error has been made which resulted in the death of an innocent person. The mistake is very often the result of an overzealous prosecutor as in the case of Isadore Zimmerman, or blatant prejudice against the defendant, as in the Sacco-Vanzetti case. Also, very few lawyers want to do the investigative work which is necessary to prove one's innocence.

Mr. President, one of the most moving statements relative to the death penalty by a condemned man is a fairly well-known statement of Bartolomeo Vanzetti, which he gave shortly before he was executed for a crime of which the Governor of Massachusetts said he was unjustly convicted. He said in those moments before he was executed:

Yes. What I say is that I am innocent, not only of the Braintree crime, but also of the Bridgewater crime. That I am not only innocent of these two crimes, but in all my life I have never stole and I have never killed and I have never spilled blood. That is what I want to say. And it is not all. Not only am I innocent of these two crimes, not only in all my life I have never stole, never killed, never spilled blood, but I have struggled all my life, since I began to reason, to eliminate crime from the earth.

Everybody that knows these two arms knows very well that I did not need to go in between the street and kill a man to take the money. I can live with my two arms and live well. But besides that, I can live even without work with my arm for other people. I have had plenty of chance to live independently and to live what the world conceives to be a higher life than not to gain our bread with the sweat of our brow.

My father in Italy is in a good condition. I could have come back in Italy and he would have welcomed me every time with open arms. Even if I come back there with not a cent in my pocket, my father could have give me a possession, not to work but to make business, or to oversee upon the land that he owns. He has wrote me many letters in that sense, and other well to do relatives have wrote me many letters in that sense that I can produce.

Well, it may be a boast. My father and my uncle can boast themselves and say things that people may not be compelled to believe. People may say they may be poor when I say that they are to consider to give me a position every time that I want to settle down and form a family and start a settled life. Well, but there are people maybe in this same court that could testify to what I have say and what my father and my uncle have say to me is not a lie, that really they have the means to give me position every time that I want.

Well, I want to reach a little farther, and it is this,—that not only have I not been trying to steal in Bridgewater, not only have I not been in Braintree to steal and kill and have never steal or kill or spilt blood in my life, not only have I struggled hard against crimes, but I have refused myself the commodity or glory of life, the pride of life of a good position, because in my consideration it is not right to exploit man. I have refused to go in business because I understand that business is a speculation on profit upon certain people that must depend upon the business man, and I do not consider that that is right and therefore I refuse to do that.

Now, I should say that I am not only innocent of all these things, not only have I never committed a real crime in my life—though some sins but not crimes—not only have I struggled all my life to eliminate crimes, the crimes that the official law and the official moral condemns, but also the crime that the official moral and the official law sanctions and sanctifies,—the exploitation and the oppression of the man by the man, and if there is a reason why I am here as a guilty man, if there is a reason why you in a few minutes can doom me, it is this reason and none else.

I beg your pardon. (Referring to paper.) There is the more good man I ever cast my eyes upon since I lived, a man that will last and will grow always more near and more dear to the people, as far as into the heart of the people, so long as admiration for goodness and for sacrifice will last. I mean Eugene Debs. I will say that even a dog that killed the chickens would not have found an American jury to convict it with the proof that the Commonwealth produced against us. That man was not with me in Plymouth or with Sacco where he was on the day of the crime. You can say that it is arbitrary, what we are saying, that he is good and he applied to the other his own goodness, that he is incapable of crime, and he believed that everybody is incapable of crime.

Well, it may be like that but it is not, it could be like that but it is not, and that man has a real experience of court, of prison and of jury. Just because he want the world a little better he was persecuted and slandered from his boyhood to his old age, and indeed he was murdered by the prison. He know, and not only he but every man of understanding in the world, not only in this country but also in the other countries, men that we have provided a certain amount of a record of the times, they all still stick with us, the flower of mankind of Europe, the better writers, the greatest thinkers of Europe, have pleaded in our favor. The scientists, the greatest scientists, the greatest statesmen of Europe, have pleaded in our favor. The people of foreign nations have pleaded in our favor.

Is it possible that only a few on the jury, only two or three men, who would condemn their mother for worldly honor and for earthly fortune; is it possible that they are right against what the world, the whole world has say it is wrong and that I know that it is wrong? If there is one that I should know it, if it is right or if it is wrong, it is I and this man. You see it is seven years that we are in jail. What we have suffered during these seven years no human tongue can say, and yet you see me before you, not trembling, you see me looking you in your eyes straight, not blushing, nor changing color, not ashamed or in fear.

Mr. President, we took the life of Sacco and Vanzetti many years ago. I now ask unanimous consent that the statement from the office of Governor Dukakis, dated July 19, 1977, relative to that execution, as well as a proclamation of Governor Dukakis of the same date, be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FROM THE OFFICE OF GOVERNOR DUKAKIS

Declaring that the "stigma and disgrace" attached by history to the names of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, their families, and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts should be "forever removed, " Governor Michael Dukakis Tuesday issued a proclamation marking the 50th anniversary of Sacco and Vanzetti's death by execution.

At noontime State House ceremonies attended by the grandson of Nicola Sacco, the Governor proclaimed August 23, 1977, "Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti Memorial Day" and called on the people of Massachusetts to guard against "the forces of intolerance, fear, and hatred," which he said clouded the atmosphere of their indictment, trial and appeals.

After signing the proclamation in the Senate Chambers, Governor Dukakis presented copies printed in English and Italian to Spencer Sacco, a grandson of Nicola Sacco, and Franco di Bruno, Italian Consul-General in Boston, who appeared on behalf of Bartolomeo Vanzetti's sister, Vincenzina Vanzetti of Cuneo, Italy.

"Sacco and Vanzetti would not have wanted to be pardoned, even it it were possible for me to do so," the Governor said, "for they maintained their innocence to the end. They asked not for mercy or forgiveness, but for justice."

"The Sacco-Vanzetti case has caused years of agony for their families and for the thousands of people who came to their defense. Today's proclamation will not wipe out their pain, nor is it meant to help us forget their cause. What it will do, I hope, is say to the world that an injustice was done—an injustice we must never repeat," the Governor continued.

Nicola Sacco, a shoemaker, and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, a fish peddler, were avowed Anarchists who were accused of murdering Alessandro Berardelli and Frederick Parmenter on April 15, 1920, during a $15,677 payroll robbery in South Braintree, Massachusetts. They were found guilty on July 14, 1921, following a six-week trial. After six years of unsuccessful appeals, during which the confession of Celestino Madeiros exonerating Sacco and Vanzetti of the South Braintree murders was rejected by the court, Sacco and Vanzetti were sentenced to death. Governor Alvin T. Fuller ordered a review of the case by a special three-member advisory committee. Based in part on the committee's findings, Governor Fuller denied clemency and on August 23, 1927, Sacco and Vanzetti were executed at Boston's Charlestown Prison.

In his proclamation, Governor Dukakis states that "the atmosphere of their trial and appeals was permeated by prejudice against foreigners and hostility toward unorthodox political views," and that "the conduct of many officials involved in the case shed serious doubts on their willingness and ability to conduct the prosecution and trial of Sacco and Vanzetti fairly and impartially."

A memorandum on the case prepared by the Governor's Legal Office cites a number of abuses by the prosecution, including "making use of false evidence, making use of unfair and misleading evidence, withholding exculpatory evidence, and appealing to the jury's prejudice and biases." Similar charges of prejudicial behavior have been made against the trial judge.

The proclamation points out that Massachusetts law at that time limited the possibility of Sacco and Vanzetti being given a new trial. Until a 1939 change in state law, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court could order a new trial only when the verdict was contrary to the law. With passage of Chapter 341 of the Acts of 1939, as a direct result of the Sacco-Vanzetti case, the state's highest court was empowered to order a new trial when the verdict went against the weight of evidence or was contradicted by newly discovered evidence, or "for any other reason that justice may require."

Speaking at the proclamation signing, Governor Dukakis stated, "We are not here to determine whether these men were guilty or innocent. We are here to say that the high standards of justice which we in Massachusetts take such pride in, failed Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, and as the proclamation states, 'to remind all civilized people of the constant need to guard against our susceptibility to prejudice, our intolerance of unorthodox ideas, and our failure to defend the rights of persons who are looked upon as strangers in our midst.'"

Proclaiming August 23, 1977, "Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti Memorial Day", the Governor declared that "the stigma and disgrace should be forever removed from the names of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, from their families and descendants, and so, from the name of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Accepting the proclamation on behalf of the Sacco family, Spencer Sacco thanked the Governor "personally for taking the initiative to correct an injustice that has been with us for fifty years. We, the family, wish to accept this proclamation on behalf of all those who have witnessed or been victims of similar injustices."

On July 14th, Mr. Sacco flew to Italy to present a copy of the proclamation to Vincenzina Vanzetti. In a letter to the Governor, Bartolomeo Vanzetti's only surviving sister thanks the Governor on behalf of her brother Ettore and herself "for the happy outcome of this cause which is so close to my heart and for which I have been working so many decades."

She continues: "I have lived for so many years with the hope of seeing the issuing of such a document. I thank you not only for myself and my family but also on behalf of all who in Italy and throughout the world have worked and are still working for this cause."

Also participating in the proclamation ceremonies were Massachusetts Secretary of State Paul Guzzi, who co-signed the proclamation for the Commonwealth, and Suffolk University Professor of Law, Alexander J. Cella, who made opening remarks.

A PROCLAMATION—1977

Whereas, a half century ago next month, Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti were executed by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts after being indicted, tried, and found guilty of murdering Alessandro Berardelli and Frederick A. Parmenter; and

Whereas, Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti were Italian immigrants who lived and worked in Massachusetts while openly professing their beliefs in the doctrines of anarchism; and

Whereas, the atmosphere of their trial and appeals was permeated by prejudice against foreigners and hostility toward unorthodox political views; and

Whereas, the conduct of many of the officials involved in the case shed serious doubt on their willingness and ability to conduct the prosecution and trial of Sacco and Vanzetti fairly and impartially; and

Whereas, the limited scope of appellate review then in effect did not allow a new trial to be ordered based on the prejudicial effect of the proceedings as a whole; and

Whereas, this situation was later rectified as a direct result of their case by the adoption of Chapter 341 of the Acts of 1939, which permitted the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court to order a new trial not merely because the verdict was contrary to the law, but also if is was against the weight of the evidence, contradicted by newly discovered evidence, or "for any other reason than justice may require"; and

Whereas, the people of Massachusetts today take pride in the strength and vitality of their governmental institutions, particularly in the high quality of their legal system; and

Whereas, they recognize that all human institutions are imperfect, that the possibility of injustice is ever-present, and that the acknowledgment of fault, combined with a resolve to do better, are signs of strength in a free society; and

Whereas, the trial and execution of Sacco and Vanzetti should serve to remind all civilized people of the constant need to guard against our susceptibility to prejudice, our intolerance of unorthodox ideas, and our failure to defend the rights of persons who are looked upon as strangers in our midst; and

Whereas, simple decency and compassion, as well as respect for truth and an enduring commitment to our nation's highest ideals, require that the fate of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti be pondered by all who cherish tolerance, justice and human understanding; and

Whereas, Tuesday, August 23, 1977, will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the execution of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts;

Now, therefore, I, Michael S. Dukakis, Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, by virtue of the authority conferred upon me as Supreme Executive Magistrate by the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and by all other authority vested in me, do hereby proclaim Tuesday, August 23, 1977, "NICOLA SACCO AND BARTOLOMEO VANZETTI MEMORIAL DAY"; and declare, further, that any stigma and disgrace should be forever removed from the names of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, from the names of their families and descendants, and so, from the name of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; and I hereby call upon all the people of Massachusetts to pause in their daily endeavors to reflect upon these tragic events, and draw from their historic lessons the resolve to prevent the forces of intolerance, fear, and hatred from ever again uniting to overcome the rationality, wisdom, and fairness to which our legal system aspires.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, the State of Massachusetts, like my own State of Michigan, has had a number of cases where innocent persons have been victims of an imperfect judicial system. On March 22, 1982, Mr. Mark Grodin, assistant professor of law at the New England School of Law testified before the Massachusetts Legislature on miscarriages of justice in the State of Massachusetts. His testimony read:

I have conducted research into several cases in Massachusetts in which persons were put to death or condemned to die and in which there later developed evidence clearing them of the crime charged or at least raising very serious doubts about their guilt. These cases remind us of the fallibility of our criminal justice system even when making a decision as momentous as imposing the death sanctions.

The number of these cases and the patterns that emerge from them provide us with very little confidence that restoration of the death penalty will not result again in the killing of innocent persons by the commonwealth.

(During Mr. LEVIN's remarks the following occurred:)

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to yield to my friend from Pennsylvania without losing my right to the floor and without this being counted as my first speech in toto under the two-speech rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRASSLEY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan, Mr. LEVIN, for yielding this time to permit me to speak on S. 1765 and to state my reasons for supporting and being a cosponsor of this legislation.

There is no more difficult question, either philosophically or from a practical point of view, than the issue of the death penalty. It is obviously difficult under any circumstance for society to exact capital punishment. But it is my judgment, based upon experience as a prosecuting attorney and as a defense attorney and as an observer of the criminal justice system, that the death penalty is warranted in a limited number of cases.

My conclusion stems from my experience and judgment that capital punishment is, in fact, a deterrent. If the death penalty is invoked in a limited number of cases, it can have a substantial effect on decreasing criminal conduct, decreasing murder, and decreasing other crimes of violence which are likely to lead to murder.

One case is illustrative of many I have seen. That involved an incident in the late 1950's with three young men by the names of Williams, Cater, and Rivers, a celebrated murder case in the city of Philadelphia. Williams was the ringleader, a young man of 19; Cater was 18, and Rivers was 17. Rivers had been selected to join in the planned robbery because he had no prior record. His fingerprints were, therefore, not on file and he could open the drugstore door as planned without leaving his prints as a source of detection.

Williams, the oldest of the group, had a revolver and brandished it as they talked about planning a drugstore robbery. Cater and Rivers refused to go along with Williams if he took the revolver because, as later disclosed in their confessions, Cater and Rivers were concerned that if a revolver were taken on the robbery someone might be killed and they might get the death penalty.

These facts were set forth at length when the men confessed after the fact. Those confessions are on record with the prothonotary, and the records are preserved in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

When Williams saw that Cater and Rivers refused to go along with the revolver, he said he would leave the revolver behind and slammed the door shut with the revolver behind it. Cater and Rivers then rose to leave and, unbeknownst to them, Williams took the revolver from behind the door.

Cater and Rivers were men with marginal IQ's, but they were concerned that a weapon should not be taken lest someone be killed and they face the possibility of the death penalty.

But unbeknownst to Cater and Rivers, Williams did take the gun along. They moved to a drugstore in north Philadelphia. The proprietor resisted, Williams drew the revolver and shot and killed him, a classic felony murder resulting from the robbery.

Williams ultimately was executed for the offense. Cater and Rivers were sentenced to death, but their offense was ultimately commuted because they, in fact, did not know that the gun was to be used. Although equally guilty as a matter of law, they did not receive the death penalty as discretion was used.

That case is illustrative, in my judgment, of how two young men who were prepared to be robbers, even men with marginal I.Q.'s and very little by way of educational background, were unwilling to participate in a robbery if a weapon were to be used which might result in a killing and in the imposition of the death penalty on them.

I have heard from professional burglars that they will not carry weapons in the course of their burglaries because they are apprehensive of a scuffle, apprehensive of resistance, and apprehensive that they may use the weapon and face the possibility of the death penalty in the jurisdictions where capital punishment is imposed.

In 1960, 1961, and 1962, when I held the position as assistant district attorney in Philadelphia, as chief of the Appeals, Pardon, and Parole Division, it was my responsibility to interview applicants for pardons. During the course of those interviews, I had the responsibility to talk to hundreds of men and women who were in jail who were applying for pardons. They discussed the background of their own particular crime, their own mental attitudes, and their own outlooks.

During the course of those interviews, and during the course of interviewing inmates in Pennsylvania prisons over the 8 years that I was district attorney of the city of Philadelphia and made frequent visits to the prisons, I learned that the people in those penal institutions were very aware, very knowledgeable, very concerned about the potential penalties. They very much take into accout the presence of the death penalty if they in fact are involved in the commission of a crime which may result in someone's death.

I realize that the statistics on whether capital punishment is a deterrrent go both ways. But the judgments which I have had in the course of some substantial experience in the field have convinced me that capital punishment is, in fact, a deterrent.

In my judgment, the death penalty ought to be imposed in only the most extraordinary cases. On an average in the city of Philadelphia, there were some 500 homicides, and our rule was that the district attorney himself had to make the decision to seek the death penalty. That was a rule long before I became district attorney in Philadelphia. Those analyses were very careful and painstaking. There were only two or three or perhaps four cases a year where the death penalty was recommended. Of course, that was only the prosecutor's recommendation. The matter had to be presented to the court, juries had to be convinced, and the juries ultimately had to impose the death penalty. And it was done in a very limited number of cases.

But it is my judgment that the availability of the death penalty was, in fact, a significant deterrent to those who would rob or rape or murder or where murder was a possible or probable consequence of the commission of a felony. On consideration of which cases merited the death penalty, there are some horrendous examples—those with hardness of heart, with the most reprehensible of all kinds of conduct, with bad records—where the death penalty was appropriate.

The imposition of the death penalty has achieved very substantial refinement during the course of the past 10 years in the United States. During most of that time, the death penalty was not imposed at all or on a very limited basis. Since 1962 no death penalty has been carried out in Pennsylvania. During a period from 1967 to 1977, there was very possibly no death penalty carried out anywhere.

Evolving in the late 1950's, there has been a practice of a split verdict, which provided substantial protection for those accused of murder. It was the case, as a general practice in the United States, that a person's prior record was considered at the time the jury came to a conclusion on innocence or guilt, as illustrated by a famous case in Pennsylvania, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania against Anthony Scolari. Scolari was charged with robbery and murder and, during the trial, the jury heard evidence of 25 prior robberies on the part of Scolari. The jury was instructed that they were not to consider the 25 prior robberies until they had determined that Scolari was in fact guilty of the robbery at issue. Then, and only then, would they be permitted to consider his prior record on the question of the penalty, whether Scolari would have life imprisonment or death in the electric chair.

That so-called prior record rule in Pennsylvania was admittedly unfair, and Pennsylvania adopted the system of split verdict. This required that there first be a trial to determine guilt and only after guilt was determined would there then be a submission of the defendant's prior record to the jury so that a conclusion might be reached on the appropriate kind of penalty.

In the landmark decision of Furman against Georgia, handed down in 1972, the Supreme Court of the United States declared capital punishment unconstitutional because it was not rationally enforced. Following that Supreme Court decision, there were modifications in death penalty statutes across the country. I participated in the Commission To Consider Reimposition of the Death Penalty. The commission held hearings all over the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and reaffirmed the use of the penalty, using aggravating or mitigating circumstances, in conformity with the decision. The mitigating factors set forth in S. 1765 are a recognition that the jury should have before it factors which would lead it away from the death penalty, as, for example: Where the defendant was 18 years of age or less at the time of the offense; where the defendant's mental capacity was significantly impaired, although the impairment was not such as to constitute a defense to prosecution; or where the defendant was under unusual and substantial duress, although not such duress as would constitute a defense to prosecution; or where the defendant was an accomplice whose participation in the offense was relatively minor.

Prior to the Furman decision, no rule existed for such mitigating factors, but after Furman, such mitigating factors were taken into account as a matter of constitutional mandate.

Similarly, S. 1765 contains a list of aggravating factors which has been another hallmark of the Furman decision. The factors include whether the defendant had previously been convicted of an offense resulting in death, whether the defendant had previously been convicted of two or more Federal or State offenses punishable by a term of imprisonment, or whether other aggravating factors were present as recited in the law. So that, looking at the legislation which we have before us in the year 1984 there has been substantial refinement on the imposition of the death penalty to be as sure as we can that it is imposed only in an appropriate case.

Does this eliminate the possibility of mistake? I am prepared to concede that it does not. It is not possible to fashion any system of the administration of criminal justice which is foolproof. Notwithstanding the fact that there is a very heavy burden of proof on the State to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and, notwithstanding the fact that jurors and courts shy away from the death penalty, no one can say that a system can function without any mistakes. But in evaluating whether the incidents of injustice require the abolition of the death penalty to avoid any mistake or whether the incidents of injustice weigh more heavily on the side of the many victims of murders—many victims who, in my judgment, would avoid being murdered were the death penalty deterrent available—it is my feeling that the balance falls on the side of having the death penalty available in the limited number of cases I have cited.

Consider the number of murders in the United States and the growing number since 1957. According to the FBI Uniform Crime Reports, there were 8,027 murders in 1957 and in 1982 21,012 murders, a growing progression. A substantial number of those were felony murders, ranging from some 13 to 45 percent, and it is apparent that the number of murders in this country poses a major and growing national problem.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statistics may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. SPECTER. The issue of deterrence, Mr. President, extends beyond those who have been murdered, but extends as well to those who are victims of burglary, robbery, or rape. There is a substantial possibility of being murdered when those felonies are perpetrated. Those offenses range into the tens of thousands of cases annually.

So, Mr. President, it is my judgment that if the deterrent of the death penalty were to be present, there would be a significant saving of lives of the innocent victims. How many? Who can say? It is not possible to get a statistical answer. But I would venture a judgment that it would be in excess of 100 a year, or in excess of 200 a year. So that when we are talking about the number of innocent victims who are murdered each year and ask to draw an evaluation of how many of those lives would be saved if capital punishment were present as a deterrent, it is my judgment that the number would be substantial.

On balance, we ought to legislate in favor of doing our utmost to protect those innocent victims while at the same time fashioning a system which provides substantial procedural safeguards for the accused and take every reasonable precaution to avoid mistakes. We should avoid subjecting anyone to the death penalty except in those cases of outlandish and outrageous conduct and where the background and record of the individual cries out for that kind of punishment.

Mr. President, I wish to emphasize particularly a provision of S. 1765 which is based on a bill, S. 1565, I introduced last June to permit capital punishment for those serving life imprisonment who then commit a murder while in prison. This is a category of offense which, in my judgment, is one of the clearest demonstrations of why the death penalty ought to be available, where someone is serving a life sentence. If the death penalty is not available, that person obviously has nothing to lose by serving a second life sentence.

Soon after I introduced the bill in June 1983, we noted a tragic example of why this legislation is so sorely needed. On October 22 of last year, two corrections officers of the Marion, Ill., Federal prison were stabbed and killed in separate incidents. Two other guards were wounded. The murdered officers, aged 53 and 51, were both husbands and fathers. They worked in a wing which housed 60 of the most dangerous and hardened criminals at Marion. From all accounts, it appears that they were killed with brutality and cunning.

Disturbingly, the two inmates charged with the murders each have astounding criminal histories of violence. Each has been convicted of three prior murders, each has been convicted of murders of other inmates while in prison, and each was serving multiple life terms.

These two murders starkly illustrate that there are some prisoners who truly feel that they have nothing left to lose and are immune from further punishment, even if they commit another murder. In such a situation, only the threat of capital punishment can serve as a deterrent to those bent on prison violence. And only capital punishment, therefore, can save the lives of those correctional officers and inmates placed in danger every day. Similarly, the deterrence of the death penalty may serve to save the lives of other innocent victims.

So, Mr. President, I support S. 1765, realizing full well the magnitude of having a life taken even by the State under compelling circumstances such as those described today.

I again thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan for yielding. At this time, Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the distinguished Senator from Michigan and the distinguished Senator from Washington to allow me to make a few remarks in closing to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LEVIN. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. With the understanding that he not lose his right to the floor and that it not be a second speech under the rules, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I want to compliment the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania because I do not know of anybody now on the floor of the U.S. Senate who has more personal experience in this area or more actual knowledge in this area than the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, nor do I know anybody on the Judiciary Committee who works harder and understands the law better than my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania.

I think anybody who comes here arguing that we have to have a cut and dried, 100 percent sure, foolproof way of making sure nobody ever suffers is asking for the clearly impossible. But what the distinguished Senator has pointed out is that, although it is impossible to determine that there was always justice which occurs in the criminal courts of this Nation, it is possible to set the procedures and to follow the laws to the extent that very few inequities really do occur in these areas.

To say that we should not have the awesome punishment for some of these heinous, reprehensible crimes that go on in our society because occasionally we may make an error fails to recognize the importance of society's aims, goals, and needs, at a time when needs are rising very greatly.

I want to thank the distinguished Senator and express my gratitude to him for coming to the floor and giving us the benefit of his knowledge. I personally appreciate it.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, if I may, I would like to thank my distinguished colleague from Utah, Senator HATCH, for those very gracious remarks. In the course of the past 3 years I have had occasion to work very closely with Senator HATCH and we have grappled with some of the most difficult problems. I am very appreciative of his comments concerning hard work, since he is a Senator who knows what hard work is. There is no one in the Senate who works harder than Senator HATCH. I have seen him conduct hearings in the Constitutional Law Subcommittee beginning at 9 a.m. and sitting through late at night. I have seen him take on hearings for specific judicial candidates, an extracurricular chore, and work around the clock.

It has been a pleasure to work with Senator HATCH. Not that we always agree, as there are times when we do not. There has never been any occasion when he has not thoroughly analyzed all the issues to the maximum extent he can in trying to reach accommodation. I very much appreciate the opportunity to work with the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I thank my colleague.

Mr. President, this bill establishes every conceivable procedure to minimize the opportunity for error. There is no question, however, that in any human institution it carries with it the possibility of error. To suggest that society cannot operate a criminal justice system because of the possibility of error is to put into question the entire foundation of such a system.

We have to establish a system that reduces to the irreducible minimum the possibility of error and then have the self-confidence to rely on that system. If the possibility of human error is sufficient to call into question public institutions we better throw up our hands entirely. We have every possible safeguard in this bill. That is all that I think a mortal Congress can really do. Let me list illustrative protections contained in S. 1765, the safeguard protections.

The jury must determine beyond a reasonable doubt, a very difficult standard, that the defendant committed the capital offense. The jury must make this determination unanimously.

The jury must determine beyond a reasonable doubt that there was absolutely no mitigating factor involved. The jury must make this determination unanimously.

The jury must affirmatively determine beyond a reasonable doubt, again, that an aggravating circumstance existed. And I might add the jury has to make this determination unanimously.

A full appellate opportunity is required if the defendant desires. This appeal shall fully review the record, determine that the atmosphere of the trial was fair to the defendant, and determine that the record supports the jury's finding.

You have bifurcated trials, separate trials for the determination of guilt or innocence, and for the determination of the appropriate sentence.

You have multiple appeals as a matter of course, appeals in both the State and the Federal courts and systems.

You have opportunities for habeas corpus petitions.

You normally have several years of motions and countermotions before a death sentence can be carried out. You have every conceivable sort of procedural opportunity to delay the implementation of the sentence.

Let me conclude by just stating what the Massachusetts special commission said:

> We do not feel, however, that the mere possibility of error, which can never be completely ruled out, can be urged as a reason why the right of the State to inflict the death penalty can be questioned in principle. * * * All that can be expected of [human authorities] is that they take every reasonable precaution against the danger of error. When this is done by those who are charged with the application of the law, the likelihood that errors will be made descends to an irreducible minimum. If errors are then made, this is the necessary price that must be paid within a society which is made up of human beings and whose authority is exercised not by angels but by men themselves. It is not brutal or unfeeling to suggest that the danger of miscarriage of justice must be weighed against the far greater evils for which the death penalty aims to provide effective remedies.

I appreciate the comments of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. They are true. They are accurate. They are well-intentioned and, I think, they work in the final analysis.

I thank my colleague from Washington for allowing me to make these interim remarks between those of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania and his own. I thank my colleague from Michigan for allowing me to make these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The chair recognizes the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to yield the floor at this point with the understanding that subsequent remarks I might make on this measure or amendments or motions concerning this measure not be considered a second speech when I resume.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Washington.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, few issues are as difficult for Members of the Senate and citizens of this country as decisions on the death penalty.

Mr. President, the Senate has before it legislation to attempt to establish constitutional procedures to impose the death penalty for various Federal felonies. This issue has been before the Congress since the Supreme Court nullified existing Federal and State death penalty laws in 1972. These laws were struck down because the Court found they were administered in an "arbitrary and capricious" manner. Judges had too much discretion to impose sentences and juries had no clear direction in concluding which, if any, aggravating circumstances were present in a crime.

The Congress has failed to establish Federal criteria to reinstitute the death penalty because I do not believe at this juncture that such criteria can be established. In our efforts to revise the Federal death penalty statute we have focused our attention, I believe, on the wrong issues. The underlying reason for making the death penalty available is to thwart the alarming growth of violent crime in this country. As a deterrent, it does not work. As a matter of legislative policy, it is wrong. As mandated in S. 1765, the death penalty raises serious constitutional questions.

Understanding capital punishment as a question of principle imposes an unequivocal double standard. It seeks to redress a murder with a murder, or in certain cases a serious crime with a murder. The point is, killing is killing—whether it is officially sanctioned or committed by a hardened criminal—the end result simply does not justify the means.

The effectiveness of the death penalty can be measured on the basis of deterrence, retribution, and incapacitation of the convicted criminal.

DETERRENCE

In spite of a good deal of controversy, I believe there exists no conclusive evidence proving the deterrence value of capital punishment. In recent studies comparing the homicide rates of States who do and do not have the death penalty, conclusions indicated that no causal relationship existed between declines in homicides and capital punishment. For example, Minnesota and Rhode Island are two States without the death penalty. Ironically, they proportionately have the same number of killings as do neighboring Iowa and Massachusetts, both of which prescribe the death penalty. There is not one substantive bit of evidence or testimony indicating the death penalty has a superior deterrent value to life imprisonment. In fact, life imprisonment appears to serve the same purpose as incapacitation.

INCAPACITATION

The sentencing reforms this body recently passed make a positive attempt to incapacitate criminals. I joined my colleagues here in voting to establish minimum mandatory sentences to thwart habitual offenders. In passing the measure, the Senate recognized the effectiveness of this approach in preventing such criminals from committing similar crimes again, arguing prison terms without parole would deter potential murders—perhaps as many if not more than the death penalty.

RETRIBUTION

The third premise of the death penalty, retribution, requires that society operate with an "eye for an eye" mentality. I need not go into the rather bizarre consequences of extending that to other crimes and other penalties. The merits of this concept notwithstanding, we cannot even apply it to the legislation now before us which requires in some cases, a sentence of death when no death from a crime occurred. The possibility of error and the controversy over existing safeguards have created risks that are unacceptable when a human life is at stake.

Finally, the legislation raises some serious constitutional questions which cannot be treated lightly, especially since the legislation before us has had no formal hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee. The Supreme Court has questioned whether the death penalty is constitutional as a punishment for crimes where no death resulted.

I am also deeply concerned with the legislation's requirement that only a majority of jurors need to agree on which aggravating factors were present in the crime to justify the sentence of death. Furthermore, under S. 1765, an appellate court is no longer required to determine on an appeal that a sentence is or is not "out of proportion to the severity of the crime," a constitutionally mandated procedure.

Mr. President, I served for 12 years as Governor of the State of Washington. During that time, I had the unique responsibility, shared by my colleagues over the years as Governors, of determining whether a stay of execution was warranted and, in effect, had the power of life or death over those on death row.

I shall never forget an experience some years ago, visiting the State penitentiary in Walla Walla, Wash., and traveling down death row. I noticed a small, enclosed courtyard where 13 men were exercising, playing basketball. I asked who they were, and I was informed that those were all men on death row.

I realized at that time that I, as Governor, had the ultimate decision, or potentially the ultimate decision, on the life or death of those 13 men. I did not believe then, nor do I believe now, that morally I could take the life of another human being. Furthermore, I do not believe that killing represents the most effective means available to the government for the protection of its citizens. It represents a failure of law enforcement and it undermines society's respect for human life, eliminating any possibility of rehabilitation or restitution.

In conclusion, the death penalty is not justified as a matter of principle, nor as an effective legislative policy. Constitutionally, its imposition is suspect at best. The death penalty has no effect unique from that of any other available punishment. Society has the responsibility to express its moral outrage at the heinous conduct of criminals. Society has the responsibility of expressing its concerns for the victims of capital crimes. But all other issues fade beside the overwhelmingly fundamental one: Society does not have, should never have, the right to take the life of another human being. For that overwhelming reason and the others I have stated, I am opposed to S. 1765, and I urge its defeat by the Members of this body.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, let me first say that the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Washington are of great interest to me. Having worked for a Governor and having seen the agony of making those decisions, I can appreciate the impression that would make on the person who has to decide.

Also, I want to mention the fact that the Senator from Michigan and I have agreed on many issues in the law enforcement area. He had served in government before coming to the Senate. He enjoyed a very distinguished career as city councilman. As a matter of fact, he was the author of the only pornographic zoning legislation that has been upheld by the Supreme Court, to do something about that problem. His record is unsurpassed with respect to supporting strong law enforcement.

We have a disagreement here. For the next few days, I suspect that there will be debate regarding the sometimes gory details of various cases.

Mr. President, I support S. 1765, a bill to establish rational procedures for the imposition of the sentence of death in specified limited circumstances. S. 1765 was carefully and narrowly drafted to comport with U.S. Supreme Court decisions establishing procedural guidelines for imposition of the death sentence. I am convinced that the bill meets the requirements of the Constitution as laid down by the Court.

The issue and arguments surrounding the use of the death penalty are among the most familiar in American debate. Polls consistently show that two-thirds of the American electorate favor the death penalty; 39 States have death penalty statutes; and in my home State of Arizona, over 80 percent of the people have indicated they favor a death penalty for certain offenses. A clear majority of the American people want to see a death penalty statute reinstated. The question is, Will this body of its representatives reflect this view? Will we even get a chance to vote on this issue?

I thank the Senator from Michigan for agreeing to the unanimous-consent request to move to the bill, and we will have a cloture vote tomorrow.

The courts and Congress have struggled with the issue of the death penalty over the past decade, and I hope we can resolve the issue shortly.

S. 1765 was introduced in the 98th Congress by Senator THURMOND, chairman of the Judiciary Committee. The distinguished Senator from Utah was a cosponsor of this bill and the ones introduced every year since he and I joined this body in 1977. I had the honor of introducing it, as the main sponsor, in the 97th Congress.

On July 26, 1983, by a vote of 13 to 5, the committee ordered S. 1765 reported with a recommendation that it be passed by the Senate.

Congress has given extensive legislative consideration to the death penalty issue in previous Congresses. Since the 1972 Furman against Georgia decision struck down the existing Federal and State capital punishment procedural statutes, bills to restore the death sentence have been introduced in each succeeding Congress.

In the 95th Congress, S. 1382, introduced by the late Senator MCCLELLAN, was the subject of extensive hearings in the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures and in the full Judiciary Committee. S. 1382 was reported by the subcommittee in 1978, but the committee failed to report the measure to the Senate.

In the 96th Congress, I, along with Chairman THURMOND, introduced S. 114, which was similar to previous measures. S. 114 was reported by the committee on January 17, 1980, but was not considered by the Senate.

In the 97th Congress, Chairman THURMOND and I introduced a capital punishment bill, again carrying the number S. 114, which was the subject of committee hearings. Although the bill was reported by the Judiciary Committee by a vote of 13 to 5, no action was taken by the Senate.

It is clear from this chronology that the issue is ripe for action by this body. I propose that we face it squarely, as we are doing today, and that we debate some of the problems that are being raised. It is clear that a substantial majority of the American people want us to adopt the death penalty. While I look forward to our discussion here of the issues presented by this bill, I am hopeful that we in the Senate expeditiously comply with the wishes of our constituents and adopt a Federal capital punishment procedure.

Let me assure the Senator from Michigan that although we have an honest disagreement here, I believe it is necessary to present some cases with gory details, some of personal experience as a prosecutor, but some cases that are so outrageous that there seems to be a lack of understanding here as to the victims involved in these cases.

I cite a recent case in Marion, Ill., in October 1983. Marion, Ill., Federal Correctional Institute is the maximum security institute for the Federal correction system. I have taken the time to visit that institution. In October 1983, one inmate was being escorted from a shower. He paused at a cell where another inmate unlocked the handcuffs and gave the inmate a knife. The inmate stabbed the guard 40 times.

The guard was 51 years old and left a widow and three children. The inmate was 31. He had been committed for armed bank robbery. He had stabbed an inmate to death at Leavenworth in 1979, stabbed two other inmates to death at Marion, most recently in September 1982. He received three consecutive life terms for these offenses.

So we can see that it is clear that life sentences are no deterrent for premeditated murder.

At the same time in October, a second inmate was being escorted to a recreational area. He passed in front of a cell, paused, and slipped out of his handcuffs. He received a knife from a fellow inmate and stabbed an officer, killing him.

That guard was 53 years old. He left a widow and two children. He was the son of an officer who had served a full career at that same institution.

This inmate was 28 years old. He was committed to a life sentence for killing his commanding officer while in the military in the Philippines. While at Leavenworth he committed a serious escape attempt, including taking hostages and taking over control areas of the prison and obtaining a number of weapons. While at Marion, this inmate was involved in three murders of other inmates and received three consecutive life sentences also.

These two defendants are members of the Aryan Brotherhood, a very violent antiwhite group. They joined in a number of murders as is outlined, and yet they will not face the death penalty.

Those cases are being prosecuted now. A jury will decide whether or not they were the individuals who committed the act and if they do no death sentence will be available.

This is only one example of a clear case, and I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania as well as the Senator from Utah who say that there is no way to be absolutely sure that error will not occur, and no one that I know who subscribes to the death penalty wants to ever leave that impression. We are mortal human beings who believe strongly that punishment is a proper part of the criminal justice system and part of that punishment is the forfeiture of life under very strict circumstances.

Here we have a bill that would set constitutional provisions that would provide the safeguards of the individual, that would provide a second trial or hearing to determine whether or not the sentence should be imposed. There is nothing automatic about it. There is the automaticness of the second hearing and trial where aggravated mitigating circumstances will be presented. There will not be rules of evidence in that second hearing. Aggravating factors must be established beyond a reasonable doubt. This is after the defendant has been convicted of the crime by a jury of his peers and then in the hearing whether or not the death sentence should be imposed. We are talking about the aggravating factors being brought forward. Reasonable doubt is a standard that has been used in the long period of time and it is really the second time it will be brought before the hearing body here, either the jury or the judge.

If the jury, based on a unanimous vote, finds the death sentence justified, the court shall sentence the defendant to death. The jury will be instructed that the defendant has the right to justice without discrimination and each juror shall sign a statement to that effect.

So we are not going to have a wave of emotion bringing about the conclusion that the death sentence is justified. We are going to have each juror decide and sit down and take the time and contemplate and then sign a statement that no discrimination was used. I realize that we cannot legislate people's thoughts and whether or not they are discriminating. But after a jury takes the oath, I believe our system has worked well.

The amendment also has worked well and will insure that each juror will search his conscience before subscribing to the statement. The amendment also provides for an expedited review process and sets out the criteria.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we have long struggled with this. Thirty-nine States have instituted the death penalty or reinstituted it since the Supreme Court threw it out in 1972. Most of these have been upheld.

I think it is time for us to move forward on a vital piece of legislation that is to me justified and something that society is demanding for the real persons who are injured are the victims. What do we do about the victim? Do we permit a constant murdering by these individuals who are outlined in the case I gave in Marion, Ill.?

How many more inmates or guards will these two individuals decide that it makes no difference, three consecutive life sentences or six consecutive life sentences, why not take another life today, for there is no greater penalty than another consecutive life sentence?

These are justified, Mr. President, and I realize the emotion attached, because having been a prosecutor it is not an easy task when you decide to ask the court and the jury to impose the death penalty. It is not something you sit around and kick your feet back and say, "Well, shall we do it today, or shall we let this one go?"

I think anyone who is in that position has to contemplate and think deeply whether or not the justification is there and whether or not the retribution to society is proper, and in my judgment it is.

I yield the floor.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I notice that my friend from Oregon is on the floor. I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to yield to him without my continuation being counted as a second speech under rule XIX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I thank my colleague, the Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN), for yielding at this moment in order for me to make a few remarks on this subject, and to commend him on his valiant defense here of the sanctity of life. With great enthusiasm, I join him in the battle that he is leading. Let me begin my remarks to the Senate with a brief recitation of the arguments which underlie my adamant opposition to the death penalty.

First, the sentence of death has not been proven a successful deterrent to violent criminals. Second, the sentence of death has been handed out in such an arbitrary manner that it perverts even the most rudimentary notions of justice. And finally, the sentence of death is an inappropriate response to our Nation's malfunctioning criminal justice system which offers the public no other meaningful punishment for grievous offenders except the death penalty.

Before I engage in a debate grounded in legalisms, statistics, and criminal justice rhetoric, I would like to make clear that all of these arguments in opposition to the death penalty are secondary to my belief that the death penalty is fundamentally immoral and that it brutalizes the honored values we hold dear in this society—foremost of which is the value of human life.

To me, the death penalty is no different from abortion or war or any other governmentally sanctioned form of killing. Our civilization stands condemned and accountable for all of the intentional acts of violence it inflicts upon humanity, upon both the born and the unborn. Whether these acts claim justification in shifting conceptions of mortality, political ideology, or criminal justice, these acts are immoral.

We sit in this Chamber and debate issues involving the sanctity of life, and we do so far removed from the battlefields, abortion tables, and execution chambers. We lose ourselves in a maze of carefully crafted arguments. And in the process, we distance ourselves from life itself, deluding ourselves into believing that we can understand life issues through an elaborate process of intellectualization. Well, Mr. President, we cannot.

In the case of the debate on the death penalty, this tendency to run and hide from the implications of our decisions is manifest time and time again. The antiseptic term "capital punishment" is substituted for the term "public execution" or "death penalty." The executions themselves are conducted in cloak-and-dagger secrecy, with elaborate phone hook-ups to the Governor and last-second court appeals providing the impression that the Government is about to do something that it would prefer not to do. I was Governor of Oregon two decades ago and participated in this process, and the memory of that experience remains fresh to this day.

The inescapable conclusion from that experience is that killing a criminal who killed an innocent person perpetuates a circle of violence and hate and performs no function worthy of civilized government. Instead of embarking upon the high road which sustains life, the death penalty drags along the low road of vengeance, of eye-for-an-eye retribution, of cold bloodletting, and it cheapens the sanctity of life.

Ten months ago in Atmore, Ala., our society witnessed what so-called capital punishment is all about. John Louis Evans, convicted for murdering a pawnbroker in Mobile, Ala., became but another reminder of how public executions perform no valuable criminal justice function other than to remove one person from this Nation's crowded death row. Evans was led into the execution room, strapped into the Alabama electric chair, and a skullcap fitted with electrodes was placed on his head. A black mask was placed on his face, and I will now read from the April 24 edition of the Washington Post which details what transpired next:

At 8:30 p.m. CST, Warden J. D. White threw the switch and the first charge, which authorities had insisted would kill Evans instantly, surged through his body. He slammed against the straps, fists clenched permanently, and sparks flew around his head and left leg. The leather strap on his left leg burned completely through, and the electrode fell away.

Doctors detected a heartbeat. When White threw the switch again, small flames licked around Evans' head and smoke streamed from his leg and the leather cap holding electrodes to his skull.

Prison physician Dr. William Thomas said later that after the second charge, Evans "just had a weak heartbeat." Canan [Evans' lawyer] again asked for the executioner to stop, but a third charge was administered. White announced that Evans had been pronounced dead at 8:44 p.m.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire text of the Washington Post article appear in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I submit to my colleagues that the execution of John Louis Evans is a blemish on our integrity as a nation and is proof positive of why public executions do not constitute a moral, civilized sanction against criminals.

This is no "sob sister" observation. To oppose the death penalty does not mean to condone the brutal acts of murderers like John Louis Evans. Their damage has been done, and the grief which is experienced by the victim's family members will exist forever. So often the cry "What about the victim's life?" drowns out the chorus of concerned citizens who oppose the imposition of the sentence of death. The argument to the effect that "a murderer forfeits his right to live when he kills" has a ring of logic to it, but since when did logic become the highest value to which a civilization can aspire?

No one in this Chamber grieves more for the victims of senseless acts of violence than I. But the deliberate extinction of human life is not a fit response to a preceding deliberate extinction of human life.

Mr. President, Mr. Anthony Lewis in his editorial, "Kill Him, Kill Him, Kill Him," documents the sobering fact that the effect of sanctioned executions runs far beyond the death row cell blocks. Let me read an excerpt from Mr. Lewis' editorial:

The case against capital punishment rests, in the end, on the belief that the process of carrying out the death penalty degraded the society and distorts the law. Anyone who doubts the strength of that case should think about three scenes enacted in this country late on the night of October 4th.

In Huntsville, Texas, James D. Autry was taken from his death row cell in the penetentiary and strapped to a wheeled cot. Intravenous tubes were connected to both arms, ready to administer a dose of poison. Mr. Autry's fear, his perspiration, his uttered thoughts were observed and reported.

Outside, a crowd of people shouted for his death whenever television lights were turned on. 'Kill him, kill him, kill him,' they chanted. Charles Dickens could not have improved on the ghastliness of the Texas scenes. In 1849 he saw a crowd waiting for an execution, screaming and laughing. He wrote that no one could imagine 'a sight so inconceivably awful . . . I am solemnly convinced that nothing that iniquity could devise could work such ruin as one public execution.'

I ask unanimous consent that the entire text of this editorial be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, two points come to mind. First, lethal injections and other forms of "humane" executions are nothing but bandages and salves to the conscience of society. Deliberate killing is no more humane because it occurs in the sterile surroundings of a hospital room instead of in a dusty execution chamber. A saline solution abortion is no more humane than a suction abortion, and conventional war is no more humane than nuclear war.

Second, all of us feel the shock waves generated by public executions, whether these executions horrify us or appeal to our desire for retributive justice. Public executions demoralize and dehumanize our society and the scene outside of the prison in Huntsville is not one which is representative of our country's hallowed history.

Mr. President, let me now turn to the three arguments which I mentioned at the outset underlie my firm opposition to the death penalty.

First, the sentence of death has not been proven a successful deterrent to violent criminals. Many other Members of this body will address the deterrence issue, so I will not spend a great deal of the Senate's time today proving the ineffectiveness of the death penalty as a deterrent. Good commonsense is proof enough. Murderers are deterred by nothing. They do not give detached, introspective reflection to the consequences of their acts. They are persons ruled by impulses, and because the sentence of death only applies to criminals who commit especially heinous crimes, they are persons often mentally impaired and disaffected, alienated from society and themselves.

One study with which I am familiar showed that Michigan, which did away with the death penalty, had an identical homicide rate to its neighboring States which kept their execution statutes. And there are other studies which point in the other direction. The logic of deterrence is undeniable. The effectiveness of statutes aimed at deterring offenders, especially violent ones, is probably negligible at best.

Second, the sentence of death has been handed out in such an arbitrary manner that it perverts even the most rudimentary notions of justice.

Justice Brennan, in the famous Furman against Georgia case, sized up the problem as follows:

> When the punishment of death is inflicted in a trivial number of the cases in which it is legally available, the conclusion is virtually inescapable that it is being inflicted arbitrarily. Indeed, it smacks of little more than a lottery system.

A lottery system, Mr. President. That is what the sentence and execution of the death penalty have become: a lottery. And who are the losers of this lottery? The poor, the ignorant, the criminals who do not have the benefit of unlimited resources. The losers of the death penalty lottery are the ones who did not turn State's evidence and testify against their codefendants. The losers of the death penalty lottery are the ones who received appointed counsel and often received ineffective counsel. The losers of the death penalty lottery are the ones who were unlucky enough to face ambitious prosecutors who sought the death penalty to further their own legal careers as much as to further the ends of justice themselves. In short, the losers in the death penalty lottery are the ones on death row by poor fortune, without regard to the comparative severity of their crimes.

Mr. President, one need not be a seasoned constitutional lawyer to recognize the arbitrary and reckless manner in which the sentence of death is imposed. Studies have shown that similarly situated defendants, accused of identical crimes involving similar fact patterns, have been treated drastically different. The difference is not 5 years versus 10 years, or life imprisonment with parole versus life imprisonment without parole. The difference is life and death.

In fact, Mr. President, if any basis can be discerned for the imposition of the death sentence, it is the basis of race and nationality. As of December 1983, there were 1,289 people on death row. Approximately half of these people were either blacks or Hispanics: 540 blacks and 66 Hispanics. Conclusive studies are being conducted which soon will show beyond a shadow of a doubt that the race of the defendant and the race of the victim are the best predictors with respect to the imposition of a death sentence. That, my dear colleagues, hardly forms the basis of a rational death penalty sentencing procedure.

I recognize that the Supreme Court recently announced in Pulley against Harris that proportionally reviews are not constitutionally required. However, the majority stated clearly that this decision did not apply to all State capital sentencing schemes, and that the issue of race was not before the Court. While I was disappointed with the majority holding, I found the comments of Justices Brennan and Marshall, in their dissenting opinion, quite compelling.

Finally, Mr. President, I oppose the death penalty because the sentence of death is an inappropriate response to this Nation's malfunctioning criminal justice system. The public cries for a meaningful penalty for a murderer, and the criminal justice system responds with a life imprisonment sentence which is something far less than life imprisonment. That is the problem. I believe that if the public were assured that life imprisonment meant just that, then there would not be a consensus in favor of the death penalty.

The public is justifiably concerned with the cost of feeding and housing a criminal for a lifetime. There probably is not a Member in this Chamber who is more concerned over the billions of dollars that are spent each year to house and feed criminals than I. But let us keep in mind that there are over 435,000 people in prisons all over this country, and only 1,300 of them are on death row. About half of this Nation's prison population is serving time for nonviolent offenses. If we are going to address the costs of incarceration, then we should begin with that 200,000 or so who are costing the Government $15,000 to $20,000 each year while in prison. Community service and restitution are viable alternative forms of punishment which save the taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars. You could execute every person on death row and not make a dent in the annual cost of feeding and housing prisoners in this country.

Murderers and other serious offenders belong in prison and should stay there. That is the price to pay for homicide, and that is a serious, steep price. The reason we have parole and early release is due to the madness of our correctional practices. People with life imprisonment sentences receive far less because our prisons are overflowing, and we cannot keep everyone housed forever. And so, we whittle away at everyone's sentences, and that immediately changes life terms to shorter terms.

If life imprisonment meant life imprisonment, then punishment in the nature of death would find fewer and fewer supporters.

Mr. President, for the aforementioned reasons, I oppose the death penalty. My colleague from Michigan, Senator LEVIN, has also made a strong case for why "mistake" justifies the abolishment of the death penalty, and I associate myself with his comments. The death penalty is patently immoral. It brutalizes the value of life in our society. It does not deter crime, it is handed out arbitrarily and discriminatorily, and it is an inappropriate precaution to the possibility of reduced life sentences for murderers. Our society would be better served without death penalty statutes on its books. S. 1765 represents a step backward in the history of our civilization.

I thank the Senator from Michigan for yielding time.

ATTORNEY CHARGES EVANS WAS TORTURED BY ALABAMA IN BOTCHED ELECTROCUTION

ATMORE, ALA.—The lawyer for John Louis Evans III said his client was "tortured in the name of vengeance disguised as justice," But Alabama officials said today that the outcry over the way Evans was killed will not stop such executions and that the next may occur within a year.

Sparks, smoke, flames and equipment failures marked Evans' execution Friday night in the electric chair and provoked his lawyer, watching from the witness' room with three reporters, to beg Gov. George C. Wallace for mercy.

It took three 30-second jolts, each of 1,900 volts of electricity, over a nine-minute span to kill the man accused of murdering a Mobile pawnbroker. One jolt is, usually fatal, and the drawn-out execution—caused when an electrode strap malfunctioned—drew immediate reaction.

"John Evans was burned alive by the state of Alabama," his lawyer, Russell Canan, said. "Three times . . . [he] was tortured in the name of vengeance disguised as justice."

Inez Nassar, mother of the man Evans killed during a 1977 robbery attempt said, "He got what he deserved." However, she added, "I feel sorry for his mother; she has my sympathy."

Alabama Attorney General Charles Graddick, who predicted that the execution would deter crime, said it offered "a clear message to criminals." He denied that it would lead to execution of all the state's 59 death-row inmates but predicted that another execution will occur in Alabama within a year.

Evans, 33, of Beaumont, Tex., was the first person executed in Alabama since 1965 and only the seventh in the nation put to death since the Supreme Court lifted its death-penalty ban in 1976.

At 8:30 p.m. CST, Warden J. D. White threw the switch and the first charge, which authorities had insisted would kill Evans instantly, surged through his body. He slammed against the straps, fists clenched permanently, and sparks flew around his head and left leg. The leather strap on his left leg burned completely through, and the electrode fell away.

Doctors detected a heartbeat. When White threw the switch again, small flames licked around Evans' head and smoke streamed from his leg and the leather cap holding electrodes to his skull.

Canan turned to Prison Commissioner Fred Smith, in the witness room with a direct line to Wallace, and said, "I ask for clemency. I ask you to communicate this to the governor. This is cruel and unusual punishment. . . ." Smith relayed the request.

Prison physician Dr. William Thomas said later that after the second charge, Evans "Just had a weak heartbeat." Canan again asked for the executioner to stop, but a third charge was administered.

As doctors examined the body again, Smith summoned the warden and told him, "Hold everything. They're asking for clemency."

Seconds later, Smith called out: "The governor will not interfere. Proceed." But White announced that Evans had been pronounced dead at 8:44 p.m.

"There wouldn't be any way in my medical judgment," Thomas said, that Evans would not have died soon from the first charge. Later, Smith said that there was "no way it could be foreseen" that a new strap would fail and prevent Evans from dying quickly.

'KILL HIM, KILL HIM, KILL HIM'

(By Anthony Lewis)

WASHINGTON.—The case against capital punishment rests, in the end, on the belief that the process of carrying out the death penalty degrades the society and distorts the law. Anyone who doubts the strength of that case should think about three scenes enacted in this country late on the night of Oct. 4.

In Huntsville, Tex., James D. Autry was taken from his death row cell in the penetentiary and strapped to a wheeled cot. Intravenous tubes were connected to both arms, ready to administer a dose of poison. Mr. Autry's fear, his perspiration, his uttered thoughts were observed and reported.

Outside, a crowd of people shouted for this death whenever television lights were turned on, "Kill him, kill him, kill him," they chanted.

In the Supreme Court building in Washington, Justice Byron R. White waited for a last-minute application for a stay of execution. The application, written on three sheets of a yellow pad, made a new argument related to another case due to be heard by the Court. Shortly after midnight Justice White granted the stay.

Charles Dickens could not have improved on the ghastliness of the Texas scenes. In 1849 he saw a crowd waiting for an execution, screaming and laughing. He wrote that no one could imagine "a sight so inconceivably awful. . . . I am solemnly convinced that nothing that iniquity could devise could work such ruin as one public execution."

Supporters of the death penalty argue that the opponents are bleeding hearts who waste sympathy on brutal killers. They argue also that executions would have a deterrent effect if lawyers did not put so many obstacles in the way.

But there is no way to administer the death penalty fairly in human terms, efficiently in the use of legal resources, effectively in terms of deterrents. That is why executions have stopped in all the countries of Western Europe. It is also the inescapable lesson of the recent history in those of our states that have capital punishment.

Fairness would mean at least a rough sense that the death penalty was imposed for similar reasons in different cases: reasons having to do with the nature of the crime and the criminal's record, not his race or the accident of where he lived. But there is not even rough justice in decisions on who shall live and who shall die.

A massive study recently completed shows that race is still a big factor. It was done by David Baldus, professor of law at the University of Iowa. He went into it doubting the relevance of race, but the figures would not go away.

Professor Baldus studied 1,200 cases of murder or manslaughter brought by prosecutors between 1973 and 1979 in Georgia, a key state in the legal history of capital punishment. He weighed more than 500 factors, involving the strength of the evidence, the character of the defendant, the nature of the crime and so on.

He found that the death penalty is least predictable in Georgia in cases with some aggravating factors but not extreme brutality. There the discretion of prosecutors and juries is crucial, and race tells.

A black person who kills a white in such cases is 3.7 times as likely to be sentenced to death in Georgia as a white who kills a white, Professor Baldus found. Prosecutors are also more likely to press for the death penalty.

Beyond the issue of race, there is the question whether judges impose death sentences in like circumstances. The Supreme Court, when it upheld the death penalty in 1976, assumed that appellate judges would assure "proportionality" in reviewing sentences, but many experts say they have not. That is the issue that the Court will examine this term—and that was raised at the last minute in the Autry case.

Why couldn't legal objections to executions be raised in a more orderly way? One answer is that there are not enough competent lawyers for the people on death row in this country: not nearly enough. In states with dozens awaiting execution, such as Florida and Georgia, a few desperate lawyers work on the cases.

There are now 1,230 Americans on death row. That appalling number makes it certain that the Supreme Court and other courts, state and Federal, will continue to be deluged by petitions in capital cases. There is no way to dispose of those legal papers summarily. Human lives are at stake, and not all of the convicted persons are brutes. Every once in a while one turns out to be innocent. Many have been treated unfairly.

Nor, finally, is there any way to make administration of the penalty more humane. The process degrades not just the Dickensian crowd outside but all of us. If there were a way to be sure that justice had been done to those 1,200 prisoners, would we want to kill them all in a week? A month? If not, capital punishment will remain what it is: an ugly lottery that deters no one and soils our national character.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I encourage Senators who have speeches to make to come to the floor and do it today. I especially urge Republican Senators who may wish to speak on this subject to notify our cloakroom, so that we can establish the hour of adjournment or recess today and establish the time for convening tomorrow.

There is no desire to cut off any Member who wishes to speak, but the leadership on this side needs some guidance from our Members on how many wish to speak, so that we can allocate the time. I am willing to ask the Senate to stay as long as needed in order to accommodate Senators who wish to speak. But keep in mind that, under the provisions of rule XXII, we have to vote 1 hour after we meet and after a quorum is established. I should like, either by establishing the convening hour or by unanimous consent, to set the time to vote on cloture between 1 p.m. and 1:30 p.m. tomorrow. I have not yet had an opportunity to consult with the minority leader on that. He is temporarily out of contact, but as soon as I can do so, I will discuss the matter with him.

I urge Members who wish to speak on this matter today to do so. I will have a further announcement about adjournment time today and convening time tomorrow after we have a better idea of how many Senators wish to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, Will Purvis, Jack O'Neil, Michael Synon, J. B. Brown, John Schuyler, Neil Shumway, F. N. U. Frank, Charles Stielow, Tom Mooney, Maurice Mays, "Russell," Frank Dove, Fred Dove, and George Williams.

Edward Larkman, Anastarcio Vargas, Stephen Grezschowiak, Max Rybarczyk, Pietro Matera, Gus Colin Langley, Coke Brite, John Brite, Roosevelt Wilson, Louis Hoffner, and Abraham Podinker.

William Lindley, Silas Rogers, Pvt. A. B. Ritchie, Samuel Tito Williams, John Valletutti, David Almeida, Ralph Lobaugh, Frank Smith, Gordon Morris, Robert Ballard Bailey, Edgar Labat, Clinton Poret, Lloyd Eldon Miller, and John Rexinger.

What do all these people have in common? They have all been sentenced to death for murders they did not commit. In some cases, new evidence exonerated them. In other cases, the true murderer later confessed.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this list alone would be sufficient reason to oppose this bill. There are many reasons to oppose S. 1765, a bill that will put the Federal Government in the business of taking human life.

Foremost, the death penalty reflects a complete lack of appreciation for the sanctity of life.

No civilized society should sanction such horrible, painful and irreversible punishment.

In our country, the death penalty is an especially odious punishment. It has been arbirtrary and discriminatory. In the United States, the people who are sentenced to die are disproportionately black, male, and poor. Some persons convicted of a crime are given a life sentence, while others who have committed the same offense are sentenced to death.

I oppose the Federal death penalty because it is impossible to protect innocent people from conviction and execution. Our criminal justice system is run by people. Our juries are composed of people.

As Lafayette put it over 150 years ago:

> I shall continue to demand the abolition of the death penalty until I have the infallibility of human judgments demonstrated to me.

To allow human error—to deprive innocent persons of their lives is a horror that no American should ever have to face. Some may suggest that a few errors are a small price to pay for removing "Vicious Criminals" from our society. But I say that one unwarranted death sentence, one erroneous execution is one too many.

Through history, there have been many instances of innocent people being sentenced to death and at least seven instances of erroneous executions.

In 1950, Timothy John Evans was hanged in England for the murder of his wife and child. Convicted largely because of the testimony of a witness, Evans was executed even though the victims' bodies were never found. Four years later, the witness, John R. Christie, confessed to the Evans murders, as well as to several others. Horrified police discovered nine bodies hidden in the wall in Christie's house. The Evans case, which has been termed the "best-documented modern example of an execution in error" was a major factor in the abolition of capital punishment in England. (Stephen Gettinger, "Sentenced To Die," New York: MacMillan, 1979, p. 184.) Yet the United States, which has an even more frightening history of erroneous murder convictions and erroneous executions, is not shocked enough to abolish capital punishment once and for all. Instead, today we are considering legislation to expand the use of the death penalty in the United States.

But we Americans have our own "Timothy Evans" stories. They illustrate how our criminal justice system cannot be relied on to insure that only the guilty are executed. Inevitably, innocent persons will be convicted due to mistake or malice on the part of prosecutors, incompetence or worse by police, and sheer human error by private citizens.

In 1938, Isidore Zimmerman was about to be admitted to Columbia University on a football scholarship and hoped to become a lawyer. Instead, he was arrested, tried, and convicted in the murder of a New York City patrolman.

No one ever accused Zimmerman of the killing. Rather, two witnesses who supplied the gun to the actual killers testified—under immunity—that they received the gun originally from Zimmerman. Based on this testimony, Zimmerman was sent to death row with the real killers. On January 26, 1939, after he finished his last meal before his planned electrocution, Governor Lehman commuted his sentence to life in prison.

Only in 1962, after another procedural petition was filed by his defense lawyers, did the New York courts vindicate Zimmerman's persistent claim of innocence. Zimmerman's lawyer produced sworn pretrial statements by one of Zimmerman's accusers that Zimmerman was innocent. The testimony had been deliberately suppressed by the prosecutor, because Zimmerman had refused to cooperate with them in an unrelated police brutality case.

It is noteworthy that we debate this bill just after passing the habeas corpus bill. That bill will drastically limit the period of time in which people convicted of capital offenses can have their claims reexamined by Federal courts. The Zimmerman case illustrates the fact that evidence exonerating a condemned man may surface only years after conviction. By imposing a statute of limitations on habeas corpus review by Federal courts, we have increased the risk that people like Izzy Zimmerman will never be freed because the execution will have already occurred.

While the Zimmerman case was the result of deliberate malfeasance on the part of the prosecutors, others are wrongly convicted by a system that is not capable of overcoming incompetence. Jerry Banks was convicted and sentenced to death in 1975 for the murder of two people in the woods near Stockbridge, Ga. Banks had found the victims, and police found spent shells from Bank's shotgun on the scene. Despite evidence that Banks had been hunting nearby the week before, and was with a neighbor at the time of the shooting, a jury sentenced him to die.

After the trial, a motorist who had been flagged down by Banks came forward to corroborate the defendant's story. The trial judge refused to order a new trial, but one was obtained on appeal. In the second trial, Banks' attorney—who has since been disbarred—called only the motorist, and failed to discuss the alibi witness. Again, a death sentence resulted.

After a second trial, overwhelming evidence of Banks' innocence came to light. These included statements by a number of witnesses that a white man was seen near the crime with an automatic weapon—parenthetically, I should point out that Banks is black—that rapid fire shots were heard, and that Banks' shotgun could not have fired those shots. All of these witnesses claimed that they had notified the sheriff's office; no one at the sheriff's office remembers the contact. Incredibly, the trial judge refused another trial. Again, Banks won on appeal, and faces another trial.

Mr. President, we must recognize that erroneous convictions result because of human fallibility. Eyewitness identification, based on fleeting recollections when a witness is shocked or frightened, is the principal evidence used in many convictions. Sometimes people are just plain wrong. Because of these mistakes, our criminal justice system should never impose irreversible punishment such as death.

I might say parenthetically that sometimes there are cases brought to my attention of rape, murder, and other heinous crimes, where I personally would feel that if I had the murderer, the rapist in my hands I feel so strongly about it that I could destroy him myself.

I understand the whole question of feeling that the murderer, the rapist should pay the highest penalty. But I also understand that mistakes have been made and will continue to be made over and over again.

I am convinced that if we pass this legislation in all probability they will be made under the statute we enact.

There is obviously a higher moral issue involved having to do with the matter of taking a fellow human being's life.

Others have addressed themselves to that issue and I share their views on that in that connection.

I am confining most of my remarks today to the matter of capital punishment and the number of errors that have been made in the past where a human life either has been taken or at the last minute that life has been saved by reason of the truly guilty person coming forward and either pointing the finger, coming up with new evidence, or admitting the crime.

In my own State of Ohio, William Jackson served 5 years on a rape conviction because of misidentification. Only then did the real criminal surface. He was found because he was caught committing another crime which led to evidence tying him to the rapes. The two men had similar haircuts, facial shapes, mustaches, and partial beards, and are of the same height and build. Mr. Jackson, with a great deal of charity, does not blame the victims who misidentified him. One shudders to think that this sort of misidentification could easily be the basis of a capital conviction.

A recent case right here in the District of Columbia demonstrates why, despite the numerous protections we afford criminal defendants, it is fortunate that the District has no death penalty.

In 1975, Bradford brown was arrested for murdering a man in Ivy City, in southeast Washington. Several neighborhood witnesses testified against Brown, and he was convicted. The D.C. Court of Appeals routinely affirmed the conviction.

Only years later did a resourceful detective learn through an informant that another man was the killer. After doing independent investigating, Detective Robert Kanjian found evidence linking the real killer to the crime, and the killer is now in jail.

According to Chief Appellate Judge Theodore Newman, Brown's case: "was a routine, ordinary appeal—the system worked, but unfortunately convicted a man who was legally and functionally innocent." Judge Newman now wonders about the reliability of eyewitness identification and Detective Kanjian is now changing his mind on the death penalty. "I kept thinking about what could have happened if Bradford had been in a State with a death penalty," he stated in an interview.

Of course, our Constitution guarantees that no person shall be convicted of a crime unless his or her guilt is proven beyond a reasonable doubt. But I must confess that the following case demonstrates why this strict standard of proof is not sufficient to justify the irreparable imposition of the death penalty.

Earl Charles, a native of Savannah, Ga., moved to Tampa, Fla., in September 1974. In December of that year, he was extradited back to Savannah and accused of a brutal robbery-murder. The principal evidence against Charles was an eyewitness. The eyewitness had originally failed to recognize Charles' photograph. Later, she identified Charles after detectives told her that Charles would be arrested anyway. Against this testimony, Charles presented time cards, rent receipts, and testimony by his Tampa employer to prove he had been at work hundreds of miles away at the time of the killings. Nevertheless, Charles was convicted and sentenced to die.

Fortunately, Charles' family had some money and a home they could mortgage, and could retain counsel to vindicate him. Fortunately, a veteran Savannah lawyer was able to, in his words, deliberately string this thing out so that he could prove Charles' innocence.

Finally, a Tampa policeman recalled talking to Charles in Tampa on the day of the murder, and a note confirming the conversation was found in the officer's logbook. This evidence, unlike the others, was apparently enough for the court, for the conviction was overturned and the charges dropped.

Mr. President, our Bill of Rights extends to those citizens accused of a crime substantial protection. But it is simply impossible to say that these protections provide sufficient guarantees so that we can undertake irreversible punishments such as death.

Today there are more than 1,200 men and women under a sentence of death in this country. Which of these 1,200 will be the next Isidore Zimmerman, a victim of prosecutorial malice? The next Jeremy Banks, a victim of layer upon layer of police incompetence? The next William Jackson, Bradford Brown, or Earl Charles, all victims of mistaken eyewitness identification? Can we, as a nation, really afford to say that isolated mistakes are acceptable as long as most of those executed are killers? How many mistakes are we willing to allow. I believe that we have already allowed too many mistakes, and I, for one believe we must abolish the death penalty. No innocent American should ever have to face death at the hands of his Government because of inevitable mistakes made by our criminal justice system.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point more specific data with respect to the names of those that I mentioned earlier as having been found guilty of murder and of then having been found innocent at a later point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. Will Purvis (Mississippi, 1893). On basis of eyewitness testimony, sentenced to death for murder. Survived hanging because knot slipped. Pardoned in 1898, and cleared by 1917 deathbed confession of true culprit.

2. Jack O'Neil (Massachusetts, 1898). Hanged for murder. Several months later, another confessed.

3. Michael Synon (Illinois, 1900). Death sentence reversed on appeal for prejudicial remarks of trial judge. At second trial, witness testified that Synon was miles away from the scene of the crime; he was acquitted.

4. J. B. Brown (Florida, 1901). Sentenced to death for murder, his hanging was averted at gallows because execution warrant listed the jury foreman's name. Sentence commuted; released after another confessed in 1913.

5. John Schuyler (New Jersey, 1907). Sentenced to death for murder, pardoned and indemnified eight years later when real murderer confessed.

6. Neil Shumway (Nebraska, 1907). Hanged for murder in 1909. Three years later, victim's husband confessed to crime.

7. "Dago" Frank (New York, 1915). Executed for murder. "Accomplices" later admitted that Frank was not even present at scene of crime.

8. Charles Stielow (New York, 1915). Sentenced to death for murder. Received stay forty minutes before scheduled execution. Three years later, released when real culprit confessed.

9. Tom Mooney (California, 1916). Sentenced to death for murder. Sentence commuted, later pardoned. Political conviction, based on perjured eyewitness testimony and falsification of other evidence.

10. Maurice Mays (Tennessee, 1919). Executed for murder. Five and a half years later, true killer confessed. Interesting facts.

11. "Russell" (New York, 1920). Executed for cop killing. "Accomplice" later said Russell was not guilty, and admitted his own guilt.

12. Frank Dove, Fred Dove, & George Williams (North Carolina, 1922). All sentenced to death for murder. A fourth defendant, on the morning of his execution, stated that the three had nothing to do with the murder. After six years in prison, the three were pardoned.

13. Edward Larkman (New York, 1925). Sentenced to death for murder. Sentence commuted; another confessed; pardoned in 1933.

14. Anastarcio Vargas (Texas, 1926). Sentenced to death, his head had been shaven for execution when a look-alike confessed. Released in 1930, and later pardoned.

15. Stephen Grezschowiak & Max Rybarczyk (New York, 1930). Convicted with third man of felony murder and executed. Third man said these two were never involved.

16. Pietro Matera (New York, 1931). Death sentence for murder; commuted. In winter 1960, wife of the true killer confessed to having framed Matera—he was released after thirty years in prison.

17. Gus Colin Langley (North Carolina, 1932). Sentenced to death for robbery/murder, was twenty-five minutes from execution when technicality saved his life. Released and eventually pardoned after witnesses proved he was 400 miles away at time of crime.

18. Coke Brite & John Brite (California, 1936). Death sentences for murder commuted to life; paroled in 1952 after evidence that prosecution's case was based on perjured testimony.

19. Roosevelt Wilson (Alabama, 1937). Sentenced to death for rape, despite claims that "victim" consented. Jurors later said they believed act was consensual but that Wilson deserved to die simply for "messing around" with a white woman (Wilson was black).

20. Louis Hoffner (New York, 1940). Death sentence for murder commuted. Released in 1955 and indemnified for false imprisonment.

21. Abraham Podinker (New York, 1942). Death sentence for murder commuted. Sentence set aside in 1961 because prosecutor covered up perjured testimony of key witnesses.

22. William Lindley (California, 1943). Death sentence for murder commuted. True killer identified but never located. Lindley was never released or pardoned.

23. Silas Rogers (Virginia, 1943). Originally sentenced to death, released after nine years in prison. Governor termed Rogers a "victim of a gross miscarriage of justice."

24. Pvt. A. B. Richie (U.S. Army, 1945). Court martialed and sentenced to death for murder. Last-minute commutation by President Truman averted hanging. Pardoned in 1947 after another confessed.

25. Samuel Tito Williams (New York, 1947). Death sentence for murder. After almost sixteen years in prison (22 months on death row), released because confession had been coerced. Later compensated by the State.

26. John Valletutti (New York, 1947). Death sentence reversed on appeal. Police had beaten Valletutti into confessing, and actual killer later confessed.

27. David Almeida (Pennsylvania, 1947). Sentenced to death for his role in supermarket robbery during which policeman was killed. Later found that prosecution suppressed evidence showing victim killed by bullet from another cop's gun.

28. Ralph Lobaugh (Indiana, 1947). Death sentence for three rape-murders. Within three years, another man had been convicted of one of the crimes, and a third man had confessed to the other two. Lobaugh's sentence commuted to life; finally released in 1977.

29. Frank Smith (Connecticut, 1949). After eight execution dates had been set, new evidence found in 1954. Sentence commuted to life two hours before scheduled execution.

30. Gordon Morris (Texas, 195?). Death sentence commuted after murder victim's brother showed that Morris could not have committed the crime. Finally released.

31. Robert Ballard Bailey (West Virginia, 1950). Under death sentence for murder, received a reprieve 48 hours before scheduled execution. Conditionally pardoned in 1960, and released from the conditional pardon in 1966.

32. Edgar Labat & Clinton Poret (Louisiana, 1953). Two black men sentenced to death for raping a white woman and robbing her male friend. After a dozen stays of execution and sixteen years on death row, released because witnesses' testimony unraveled, alibi witnesses came forward, and evidence showed that one of defendants had been beaten into confessing.

33. Lloyd Eldon Miller (Illinois, 1956). Death sentence for murder. Received a stay only hours before scheduled execution. Evidence that prosecution misrepresented paint smears on defendant's clothes as blood. Conviction set aside, and Miller released after 11 years in prison.

34. John Rexinger (California, 1957). Sentenced to death for rape, exonerated when true rapist confessed.

35. James Foster (Georgia, 1957). Based on erroneous eyewitness testimony of murder victim's wife, sentenced to death. Released when former policeman confessed to the crime.

36. Dale Bundy (Ohio, 1957). Sentenced to death for murders committed by a friend, who implicated Bundy. Acquitted after new trial.

37. Robert Shuler & Jerry Chatman (Florida, 1960). Two black men sentenced to death for raping a white woman. Freed in 1972 after proved that police had suppressed evidence and that plaster footcasts introduced at trial had been made in deputy sheriff's backyard.

38. Paul Imbler (California, 1961). Sentenced to death for murder, resentenced to life imprisonment after four years on death row. Awarded a new trial in 1969 after substantial evidence showed he was not guilty. Finally released after ten years in prison.

39. Thomas Wansley (Virginia, 1963). Black man sentenced to death for two rapes and robbery of white women. Both convictions overturned, the second one by Federal district court because of degree of prejudicial pretrial publicity.

40. Freddie Pitts & Wilbert Lee (Florida, 1963). Convicted in 1963 and again in 1972 for murder, served twelve years, mostly on death row. Finally released in 1975 after executive pardon. Another convict had confessed to the crime in 1966.

41. Calvin Sellers (Texas, 1965). Sentenced to death for armed robbery. In 1977, court found that original conviction was based on perjured testimony of two police officers.

42. Dave Keaton (Florida, 1971). Indicted erroneously with four others (the Quincy five) for robbery-murder, Keaton was the only one sentenced to death. Others confessed to the crime and were convicted. Keaton released in 1973 after State decided not to reprosecute.

43. Christopher Spicer (North Carolina, 1973). After death sentence for murder, new trial ordered for insufficiency of evidence. At second trial, jury acquitted Spicer after just 11 minutes of deliberation.

44. Thomas Gladish, Richard Kline, Clarence Smith & Richard Greer (Arizona, 1974). Four motorcyclists sentenced to death for kidnapping, rape, sodomy & murder. Fourteen months later, another confessed, a new trial was ordered, and the original indictment was dismissed. Released in December 1975.

45. Delbert Tibbs (Florida, 1974). Sentenced to death for attempted rape of 16-year-old white girl (Tibbs was black) and murder of her companion. Conviction overturned because not supported by the weight of the evidence—other than victim's unreliable testimony, no evidence that Tibbs was within 150 miles of scene of crime.

46. Johnny Ross (Louisiana, 1975). Sentenced to death for rape which occurred when he was 15. Released in 1981 when showed that his blood type did not match that of the rapist.

47. Robert Henry McDowell (North Carolina, 1979). Black man sentenced to death for murder of 4-year-old white girl. Received stay days before scheduled execution when victim's mother implicated victim's stepfather. Conviction then reversed.

48. Anibal Jaramillo (Florida, 1980). Sentenced to death for two drug-related murders. State Supreme Court reversed conviction for insufficient evidence.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EAST). The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, my friend from Ohio mentioned the case of Bradford Brown and the detective who was instrumental in correcting a terrible injustice. I would like to read a letter that the detective, Robert J. Kanjian, has written to me, very much in keeping with the eloquent remarks of our friend from Ohio. He wrote me on July 3, 1980.

CAREER CRIMINAL UNIT,
METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPT.,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LEVIN: I'm writing to bring to your attention an unusual and unfortunate case of mistaken identity which could possible have resulted in a wrongful death if the jurisdiction in which the crime had occurred had legislated the death penalty.

To be specific, one Bradford Brown was wrongly convicted of murder and given an eighteen (18) years to life sentence. Fortunately, the District of Columbia does not administer the death penalty. Had it subscribed to it, Bradford Brown might have been dead. He had already served a five year period of his sentence and exhausted all avenues of appeal.

When his case went as far as the U.S. Supreme Court, it refused to hear the case. This was the final blow and last resort for Bradford Brown, an innocent victim of circumstances. Black, poor and possessing a previous criminal record, Bradford resigned himself to life in prison while strongly maintaining his innocence.

Meanwhile, by a quirk of fate, another person was providing information about some crimes. The informant was positive that he knew who murdered Rodney Frazier. I checked out the information and found the case closed with a conviction of Bradford Brown. With the facts given to me, I could see it was impossible that Bradford could be guilty.

I therefore began a long and tedious struggle to prove Bradford innocent and help prove the real murderer guilty.

Joyfully in July, 1979, Bradford became a free man. However, he has no job, has lost his wife and children and is completely disillusioned.

He is not only one disillusioned. I, personally, had been an advocate of the death penalty. I was sure the criminal justice system would not allow such a thing to happen. I was sure that there were so many safeguards along the way that something like this would never happen.

But, indeed it has, and I am left to openly question our legislative "safeguards".

He was "identified" by an eyewitness who swore, "I'll never forget his face". In truth, the only resemblance to the real killer is his skin color.

He had circumstantial evidence against him. He himself was a victim of a shooting in the same block ten months earlier.

He had an alibi substantiated by many people. However, the jury overlooked his alibi.

I therefore ask, what legislation can you submit that will prevent any other unfortunate occurrences of this heinous miscarriage of justice? What can you do to protect the public from this ever happening again?

As I look back now, Bradford spent five years of his life in prison; but it seems small and insignificant when you think that he might have lost his life!

I strongly urge you to submit legislation that will require substantial safeguards so that this will never happen again; and if this is impossible, then do away with the death penalty entirely.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT J. KANJIAN,
Detective.

Mr. President, I have read a portion of a report by Law Professor Mark Brodin of the New England School of Law relative to mistakes that had occurred in Massachusetts. He was testifying before the Massachusetts Legislature in 1982. He started with recounting a case of one Jack O'Neil who was the last person in Massachusetts that was hanged prior to the abolition of the death sentence in Massachusetts.

The professor wrote:

O'Neil was convicted on circumstantial evidence of the murder of a well-to-do woman in Shelburne Falls. The trial occurred during a period of marked anti-Irish sentiment in Massachusetts, particularly in the western part of the state. O'Neil, poor and Irish, maintained his innocence to the end. Shortly after he was hanged, a soldier from the town of Shelburne Falls was mortally wounded in Cuba during a battle of the Spanish-American War. Before dying, the soldier confessed to the murder that O'Neil was executed for, and a newspaper reporter recorded it.

Ethnic prejudice is a theme that runs through many of the cases resulting in imposition of the death penalty. Jerry Gedzium was electrocuted by the Commonwealth in the late 1920's. On the first page of its February 28, 1982 edition, the Boston Post referred to him as "Jerry the Pole."

Anti-immigrant sentiment was of course a major underpinning of the trial and execution of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti. Much of the "eye-witness identification" in that case was tainted by bigotry against Italians, all of whom certain of the witnesses felt "looked alike." Volumes have been written about this case in this country and abroad. Nearly all writers and historians have concluded that there is serious doubt as to the guilt of these two men, and little doubt that they were subjected to unfair trial and postconviction procedures permeated by the atmosphere of the "Red Scare".

That is not the only case where defendants were convicted on flimsy evidence by a jury whose prejudices were inflamed by an unscrupulous prosecutor and a hostile trial judge. Around the same time that Sacco and Vanzetti were executed, a man named Cero was convicted of murder and sentenced to death. Cero was granted a new trial on the basis of evidence pointing to his employer, a man named Gallo, as the murderer. The two men were then tried jointly, each accusing the other. This time, CERO was acquitted and Gallo convicted.

The year 1928 saw the execution of one George Taylor. The courts rejected his appeals, even though another man had confessed on his deathbed to the murder which Taylor stood convicted of.

Herman Snyder was executed in the early 1930's after his appeal had been rejected by the Supreme Court. That Court voted 5 to 4, the latter four justices concluding that error had been committed in Snyder's trials.

Perhaps the case that argues most eloquently against the restoration of the death penalty is the one involving two cab drivers who were charged with a 1934 robbery at the Paramount Theater in Lynn, in which a man was killed. The defendants, Molway and Berrett, were positively identified at trial by no fewer than eight eye witnesses. Their case was scheduled to go to the jury the following Monday. Over the weekend, however, police in New York arrested three men for a very similar type holdup. These men confessed to the Paramount job, and were positively identified by the same eye witnesses. Clement Molway and Louis Berrett were released, and the other men were ultimately executed for the crime. The jury foreman who sat in the Molway-Berrett trial was interviewed shortly after their release. He informed the newspaper reporter that the jury was ready prior to the weekend break to convict the defendants, and that he was mighty glad their deliberations had been delayed. The foreman then added: "This trial has taught me one thing. Before it I was a firm believer in capital punishment. I'm not now."

Another recent case in this report before the Massachusetts Legislature was that of Johnny Ross, a black youth in Louisiana who was convicted of rape in 1975 and sentenced to death. Ross was released from custody a few years later after irrefutable proof of his innocence in the nature of blood-type evidence was discovered by attorneys working for the Southern Poverty Law Center.

Again in Massachusetts, this report refers to Lawyer Johnson, a man convicted of murder and sentenced to death several years ago who has recently been granted a new trial on the basis of evidence pointing to a prosecution witness as the real perpetrator. The evidence consisted of a witness who came forward for the first time nearly 10 years after the trial.

The Lawyer Johnson case should be a constant reminder to us of the risk of executing innocent persons, and that risk always will remain in any system where human beings are the ones who are implementing it. We are not perfect. We are human. We make mistakes. We cannot correct them when there is an execution.

In December 1971, when Lawyer Johnson was only 19 years old, he was arrested in Roxbury, Mass., for the shooting death of James Christian in the Mission Hill housing project. Lawyer Johnson was found guilty and sentenced to death in the Suffolk Superior Court in 1972. In 1974, a new trial was ordered for Johnson when it was determined that the trial judge had not permitted adequate cross-examination of the only witness who placed Lawyer Johnson at the scene of the crime. On retrial, Johnson was convicted of second degree murder and sentenced to life imprisonment. In 1981, almost 10 years after Johnson was sentenced to death, a young woman, a former neighbor, came forth with evidence that Kenneth Myers, the chief witness against Johnson during the trial, was the man who had actually committed the murder. The young woman said she saw Myers shoot Christian but was afraid to testify to that effect when Lawyer Johnson was on trial. In 1982, based on that evidence, Johnson was granted a new trial and released from prison.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a newspaper article relative to that mistake on Lawyer Johnson be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MURDER CHARGE DROPPED, HE'S FREE MAN AGAIN

(By Betsy A. Lehman and Joseph M. Harvey)

A 30-year-old Roxbury man who was sentenced to death and who spent 10 years in prison for a murder he said he did not commit was freed yesterday in Massachusetts Superior Court.

All charges against Lawyer Johnson of Dorr Street, Roxbury, were dismissed, based on new evidence from a witness to a 1971 murder who now says that Johnson was not the guilty man. The witness, who was 10 years old when the murder was committed, says the real killer was the man who testified against Johnson in two previous trials.

Shortly before noon yesterday, Massachusetts Superior Court Judge James P. McGuire accepted the recommendation of Asst. Dist. Atty. Thomas J. Mundy that charges against Johnson, who was facing a third trial in the murder of James Christian, 30, of Chelsea, be dismissed. The third trial was ordered after the new witness came forward in 1981.

Kenneth Meyers the man who previously identified Johnson as the killer, is now serving a long sentence in Walpole state prison for robbery and refuses to testify again. Without his testimony, the prosecution had no case.

Dawnielle Montiero, a neighbor in the Mission Hill project, has said she saw Meyers shoot Christian but was afraid to say so. Mundy has contended that the long delay before Montiero's testimony and her friendship with Johnson raised doubts about the reliability of her testimony.

Christian, a reported drug addict, was shot twice in the face as he came out of the doorway of a Mission Hill public housing project on Prentiss street on Dec. 17, 1971 Johnson has said all along that he was not at the scene, but in two trials could not prove it.

The first trial, in 1972, resulted in Johnson's conviction for first degree murder and Judge Wilfred J. Paquet ordering the mandatory death sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Judicial Court set aside the conviction and sentence in 1974 because Meyers the principal prosecution witness had been allowed to withhold the identities of two alleged witnesses to the shooting.

A second trial in November 1974, at which Meyers again identified Johnson as the killer, ended in a second degree murder conviction with a mandatory life sentence.

In 10 years, Johnson has been incarcerated at the Walpole, Norfolk and Concord correctional institutions.

In an interview yesterday in his mother's house, where he has lived since he was released in February on bail, Johnson said that "anger destroys," but still he is bitter about the legal system that twice convicted him, once to death, and once to life in prison. He accused prosecutors of manipulating both the jury and the testimony because they cared only about getting a conviction, not about the truth.

"It was a legal lynching." he said. The prosecution, he said, "fabricated and conspired" with Meyers. Both juries were all white; the murder victim was white, too, and Johnson, who is black, said the racial fears of the jurors were played on by the prosecution.

"I totally believed in the system of justice," he said. "My faith in the system is gone."

(Mundy, who was also the prosecutor in the original case, yesterday called Johnson's release a "travesty of justice.")

("We reluctantly dismissed the indictment because of the age of the case and the unavailability of witnesses," Mundy told The Associated Press.)

Johnson said he has little interest in voting, doesn't really feel "part of the crowd," yet, but opposes capital punishment. "Two wrongs don't make a right," he said.

In prison, Johnson learned to paint, cook and to be a barber. He is enrolled in a beauty academy now to learn to be a hairdresser. He hopes the hairdressing will support him until he can make it as a serious artist. Art is his passion, the one part of his life in which he said he feels complete confidence.

Michael Fields, a spokesman for the Campaign Against Restoration of the Death Penalty, said Johnson's case is another illustration of the injustice of the death penalty. If he had been executed, these new developments would not have done him much good," Fields said.

Johnson's lawyer Michael Avery of Boston said, "if he had been executed in 1972 we would have lost some of the beautiful art he has created."

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, earlier today, we read a letter addressed to each of us from representatives of literally dozens of religious organizations. We should make no mistake where the religious sentiment of this country is in terms of the organizations reflected in this letter. The organized religions in this country are nearly unanimously—I cannot represent unanimously—but nearly unanimously opposed to capital punishment. This letter, stating strong opposition to capital punishment, was signed by representatives of the following organizations:

The National Council of Churches; the National Council of Catholic Charities; the Union of American Hebrew Congregations; the National Office of Jesuit Social Ministries; the United Church of Christ; the Washington Ethical Action Office; General Board of Church and Society, United Methodist Church; the Mennonite Central Committee; Lutheran Church in America; the American Jewish Committee; the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.; the Church of the Brethren; the Washington Office, Episcopal Church; the National Assembly of Religious Women; the Clergy & Laity Concerned; the Presbyterian Church (USA); the Friends Committee on National Legislation; the American Jewish Congess; the Unitarian Universalist Association; the United Methodist Church; Network; the American Baptist Churches; and the Synagogue Council of America.

In addition to that evidence of the near consensus—not unanimity, but near consensus—of our religious groups in their opposition to capital punishment, I want to read from a statement of the U.S. bishops that was recently printed by the U.S. Catholic Conference.

The Catholic bishops, in their statement of opposition to capital punishment, have written as follows:

The three justifications traditionally advanced for punishment in general are retribution, deterrence, and reform.

Reform or rehabilitation of the criminal cannot serve as a justification for capital punishment, which necessarily deprives the criminal of the opportunity to develop a new way of life that conforms to the norms of society and that contributes to the common good. It may be granted that the imminence of capital punishment may induce repentence in the criminal, but we should certainly not think that this threat is somehow necessary for God's grace to touch and to transform human hearts.

The deterrence of actual or potential criminals from future deeds of violence by the threat of death is also advanced as a justifying objective of punishment. While it is certain that capital punishment prevents the individual from committing further crimes, it is far from certain that it actually prevents others from doing so. Empirical studies in this area have not given conclusive evidence that would justify the imposition of the death penalty on a few individuals as a means of preventing others from committing crimes. There are strong reasons to doubt that many crimes of violence are undertaken in a spirit of rational calculation which would be influenced by a remote threat of death. The small number of death sentences in relation to the number of murders also makes it seem highly unlikely that the threat will be carried out and so undercuts the effectiveness of the deterrent.

Mr. President, perhaps one of the most widely talked about miscarriages of justice in the capital case is that of the erroneous convictions of Freddy Pitts and Wilbur Lee, both of whom spent 12 years in Florida prisons for a crime they never committed. The following historical account of the case was compiled for a compensation committee of the Florida State Legislature and it dramatically demonstrates the obstacles involved in reversing an error of justice.

"This case has a long history," this report begins:

In August of 1963, defendants Pitts and Lee were indicted by the Gulf County Grand Jury on two first-degree murder charges before the Circuit Court of the 14th Judicial Circuit of Florida. On August 28, 1963, the trial judge sentenced the defendants to death on their tendered pleas of guilty.

I wish at times that we could put our words in italics in the RECORD, because those words are so significant. Think about it. This was a case of error, and I shall get to that in a moment, where two men were sentenced to death on pleas of guilty.

In 1966 and 1967 a first post-conviction collateral attack against these convictions was denied by the trial judge and affirmed on appeal.

In 1970 a second post-conviction collateral attack against these convictions was granted in the lower court, reversed on appeal by the District Court of Appeal, State v. Pitts, 241 So. 2d 399 (1st D.C.A. Fla. 1970), and reversed again by the Florida Supreme Court on confession of error by the State, Pitts v. State, 247 So. 2d 53 (Fla. 1971). The case on remand was then sent back for a new trial by the District Court of Appeal, Pitts v. State, 249 So. 2d 47 (1st D.C.A. Fla. 1971).

On September 15, 1971, the lower court dismissed the original 1963 grand jury indictments against the defendants on the ground that the defendants had been indicted by a grand jury from which blacks had been systematically excluded.

On October 20, 1971, the Gulf County Grand Jury re-indicted the defendants on the original first degree murder charges. On December 15, 1971, the lower court dismissed these indictments on the ground that the grand jury was illegally constituted [one of the jurors had previously been convicted of a felony and had not been restored to his civil rights], and transferred the venue of this case to Jackson County, Florida.

On January 4, 1972, the Jackson County Grand Jury indicted the defendants on the original first degree murder charges before the Circuit Court for the Fourteenth Judicial Circuit of Florida. On January 21, 1972, the defendants entered pleas of not guilty.

Within the 3 years that followed, new evidence came before the court, such that in 1975, Governor Askew, of Florida, granted a full pardon to the defendants Pitts and Lee. Governor Askew said that he could not categorically state who murdered Floyd or Burkett, who were the victims. The Governor said:

There is more than enough evidence for me to seriously question the guilt of Pitts and Lee. This evidence, in fact, points to their innocence. I am sufficiently convinced that they are innocent to warrant the action that I take today. I am persuaded that the ends of justice require me to seek freedom and a full pardon for these two men.

So, in 1963, based on pleas of guilty, two men sentenced to death, later on again sentenced to death, 13 years later were pardoned by the Governor of Florida saying that he is sufficiently convinced that they are innocent to require him to give them a full pardon.

Mr. President, in 1979, another mistake occurred in the area of capital punishment, when Melvin Lee Reynolds, of St. Joseph, Mo., at the age of 24, was sentenced to life imprisonment for a murder he did not commit. Melvin Lee Reynolds spent 4 years in prison before Charles Hatcher confessed to the murder Reynolds had been convicted of committing. Hatcher described the murder in such detail as to convince the prosecutor that only he could have committed it. Hatcher is now a prime suspect in 15 other murder cases across the country.

The key evidence presented at the trial against Melvin Lee Reynolds was a tape-recorded statement of his confession to the crime. Think of it. Here is a man later found to be totally innocent, against whom was produced a tape-recorded statement of his own confession.

Sometimes we are told: "My gosh, how can there be a mistake when there is a confession? Say you have a confessed mass murderer. Can you then still argue a mistake?" The answer is take a look at the case of Melvin Lee Reynolds.

During the trial, that confession was introduced into evidence. The defendant said that it was obtained by police harassing him. He was convicted, the jury choosing to believe the police, and during the many years that Reynolds spent in prison he consistently maintained his innocence. He said the confession was a result of police coercion. His own struggles, of course, would have likely proved to be fruitless but for the fact that another man later confessed to this murder.

If the death penalty had been inflicted there, an innocent man never could have walked out of prison.

Mr. President, an article which appeared in the St. Louis Post Dispatch on October 14, 1983, provides more of the story of Melvin Lee Reynolds. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the St. Louis Post Dispatch of that date be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONFESSION—WRONG MAN IMPRISONED

(By Terry Ganey)

JEFFERSON CITY.—Melvin Lee Reynolds, sentenced to life imprisonment for one of the most shocking murders in the history of St. Joseph, Mo., took his first step to freedom today after another man confessed to committing the crime.

Reynolds, who had insisted for the last four years that police forced him to confess to the crime, left the Missouri State Penitentiary about 7:30 a.m. for an appearance in Buchanan County Circuit Court. The appearance is a requirement of the legal process needed to set Reynolds free.

The court is the same one where Reynolds was convicted in 1979 for the sexual attack and murder of 4-year-old Eric Christgen. The jury that convicted him and the Missouri Supreme Court, which later turned down his appeal, did not believe his story that the confession had been coerced by police.

But on Thursday, Charles Hatcher, 54, announced in Buchanan County Circuit Court that he had committed the murder, setting the stage for Reynold's release.

"All this is too good for me to be true, but I'm glad it is," Reynolds, 28, said Thursday in an interview at the prison. "Ever since my mother told me (about Hatcher's confession), nothing gets me depressed in here anymore, I've had nothing but happy thoughts."

Hatcher is facing capital murder charges in the killing of another youngster in St. Joseph. He rocked the city and its Police Department when he made his admission before Judge Frank B. Connett Jr., who had presided over Reynolds' trial in 1979.

"I did take the boy, and I did kill him," Hatcher said. "I don't know why I did it."

Prosecuting attorney Michael Insco of Buchanan County said the details of Hatcher's written confession had left no doubt that he was the man who had abducted the child at a shopping mall May 26, 1978, sexually abused him and then strangled him.

After Hatcher entered his plea and waived further legal proceedings, Judge Connett sentenced him to life imprisonment.

Insco said Thursday that the Christgen murder case was closed and that Reynolds could be released. Hatcher still faces the death penalty in the murder last year of Michelle Steele, 11, a crime he denies committing.

Reynolds has said he had made his confession after marathon interrogation sessions that often lasted several hours. He recalled one that went from 8 a.m. until 1:30 a.m.

"They let me get a cup of coffee during that whole time," he said. "I was so scared, I wasn't even hungry."

He said he had confessed to end the constant harassment.

"Every person has a breaking point, and I went past mine," he said. "I told them if they wanted a confession, I'd do it. I was getting to the point where I was tired."

The case of Reynolds was not the only one in which the authorities' interrogation techniques were questioned. Before Reynolds made his confession, 64-year-old Harry Fox died of a heart attack during police questioning in the case. For 23 years, Fox had operated an elevator at a building in downtown St. Joseph, near where the Christgen boy was last seen. For was brought in for questioning as a possible witness.

Fox had been brought in for questioning June 5, 1978, according to police reports. He was questioned beginning at 8:17 p.m., became ill at 9 p.m. and was pronounced dead of a heart attack at a St. Joseph Hospital at 10:19 p.m.

A relative of Fox later said Fox was "scared to death" by the questioning.

Reynolds recanted his confession on the witness stand during his trial. But the jury convicted him of second-degree murder, Judge Connett sentenced him to life imprisonment. In September 1981, the state Supreme Court upheld the conviction and sentencing, rejecting Reynolds' arguments he had been coerced by police into giving the tape-recorded statement played at his trial.

"I have sat back and thought, if I wouldn't have made that confession, I wouldn't be in here," Reynolds said. "That was the hardest evidence they had."

Reynolds said he had been subjected to threats of physical abuse at the penitentiary because of the nature of the crime he was convicted of and had been forced into homosexual acts.

"This is a whole different world," he said. He said that he had been "gay since I was 10," but that he had led a normal life during the year preceding his arrest.

Reynolds said he did not plan to initiate any suits alleging wrongful prosecution against authorities in St. Joseph.

"I just want my freedom," he said. "My freedom means a hell of a lot more to me than some suit."

The Christgen boy, the son of a wood products businessman, disappeared from the mall after his father's secretary left him alone for a few minutes. The woman, who was acting as a babysitter, went inside a store. The boy's body was found the next day in a heavily wooded area in northwest St. Joseph.

Reynolds said he planned to rebuild his life in St. Joseph, living with his mother and stepfather.

The possibility of his release became apparent three months ago, when Hatcher wrote a letter of confession to the FBI from his cell in the St. Louis County Jail. Hatcher was facing first-degree murder charges in the death of the Steele girl, whose body was found along the Missouri River. On a change of venue, Hatcher was to stand trial on the charges in St. Louis County Circuit Court.

On July 25, Hatcher wrote the FBI, with details in the killing of the Christgen boy. The trial in St. Louis County was never held because authorities refiled charges against Hatcher, accusing him of capital murder. He is now scheduled to go to trial on the new charges in January in St. Joseph.

FBI agent Joseph Holtslag testified Thursday in Buchanan County Circuit Court that Hatcher had told him he confessed to help Reynolds. In the interview, Reynolds said he did not know Hatcher and never had heard of him.

Holtslag said that Hatcher had lived at the St. Charles Hotel in St. Joseph from April to June 1978 and that he had provided "very detailed and very accurate" information on the Christgen murder that could not have been obtained by the public.

"I squeezed hard enough to cut off his air," Holtslag quoted Hatcher as saying in a description of the boy's murder.

While Insco, the prosecuting attorney, said Thursday that the Christgen murder case was closed and that Reynolds could be released, St. Joseph Police Chief James R. Hayes disputed that conclusion. Hayes said Hatcher's written confession had six discrepancies, including the claim that the murder had occurred through strangulation. Hayes said a pathologist had found that the youth suffocated during the sexual abuse.

"We are appalled that the Missouri Highway Patrol and the St. Joseph police were not really involved, and feel we have been circumvented in what I assume will be the final solution to this case," Hayes said.

Mr. LEVIN. Finally, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial which appeared in the St. Louis Post Dispatch in October of 1983, discussing the implications of the Melvin Lee Reynolds case, be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CASE OF THE WRONG MAN

In a column opposite this page, Anthony Lewis reviews the arguments against the death penalty: it involves the state in killing as an answer to killing, it is not a proven deterrent but rather appeals to demands for vengeance, and it is dealt out almost capriciously. But the ultimate objection to the ultimate punishment is visible in the case of a Missourian who was not, thank heaven, sentenced to death.

Melvin Lee Reynolds of St. Joseph had confessed to the brutal murder of a 4-year-old boy. He said the police had subjected him to marathon interrogations that lasted as long as 14 hours, and he reached a "breaking point." But when he tried to recant his confession, the jury did not believe him, and neither did the state Supreme Court. So he was sentenced to life imprisonment. He had served four years when a man held for another murder said he killed the boy Mr. Reynolds was convicted of killing. Now the prosecutor has closed the case. Mr. Reynolds can go free.

The Reynolds case says something about confessions and police methods used to extract them, even when those methods fall short of outright physical brutality. Under the stress of constant harassment, individuals can reach breaking points. But the case says even more about capital punishment. Suppose Mr. Reynolds had been executed for the murder? There would have been no way to correct the erroneous conviction, no way for the state to make amends for killing an innocent man. Such errors have happened before. The risk is too great to incur in the future.

Mr. LEVIN. One brief portion of that editorial reads as follows:

But the case says even more about capital punishment. Suppose Mr. Reynolds had been executed for murder? There would have been no way to correct the erroneous conviction, no way for the State to make amends for killing an innocent man. Such errors have happened before. The risk is too great to incur in the future.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise in strong opposition to S. 1765, a measure the potential dangers of which far outweigh whatever merits the bill may have.

Our constituents have conferred upon us Senators grave responsibilities in matters of life and death for our Nation and our society. The bill which we are now considering carries a "procedural" label, when in fact it is one of profound substance in the direction it would give to our society. It would not only condone the death penalty, it would enshrine it as an integral part of our criminal justice system.

We are, perforce, generalists as lawmakers, although we can usually claim credentials and expertise in certain fields of legislation. By personal study and experience I believe I claim some knowledge in this highly charged area where human passions abound.

Before embarking on a legislative career I was an assistant public prosecutor in the city and county of Honolulu. That experience convinced me that the swiftness and certainty with which the criminal justice system runs its course does indeed have a salutary effect on deterring crime. But I was also convinced that the death penalty as such does not deter capital crimes.

Later, as a member of the Hawaii House of Representatives, I authored and introduced a bill to repeal the death penalty in Hawaii. This was in 1957.

Before doing so, I interviewed in prison a total of 45 convicted felons who had committed capital crimes punishable by death. To each one I posed the same question: Would you have committed the crime for which you have been convicted if you had know before the commission of the crime that the punishment would be death?

Without exception they all replied, yes, because as they explained, at the time of the commission of the crime they gave no thought whatsoever to what the consequences would be, to what the penalty would be.

This convinced me that truly the death penalty was no deterrent at all to the commission of capital crimes.

With the enthusiastic support of all religious groups in Hawaii, including the Catholics, the Protestants, the Jews, the Buddhists, and Shintoists, I was successful in achieving passage of my repeal bill in Hawaii in 1957 and, despite public passions demanding change of the law from time to time, I am proud to say that the Hawaii State Legislature has seen fit to keep this ultimate penalty off the statute books of my State.

Two years after its passage, Honolulu police officers arrested a man named Kim who had fatally stabbed his estranged wife 27 times.

He himself had reported the killing by telephone and beckoned the police to where he had killed his wife, and pointing to her said, "Well, I did that, I killed her; now you can hang me and we will be even." To his astonishment the policeman told him, "What do you mean, hang you? Didn't you know that capital punishment was repealed 2 years ago? You are not going to die. You are going to rot in jail."

Mr. Kim pounded the wall and pounded his head against the wall, and according to police reports said, "Oh, no, no, no, why did I kill her, why did I kill her then; why didn't somebody tell me that I wouldn't be killed?"

This is one instance at least when a person committed a capital crime because he thought he was going to receive capital punishment.

He thought the death penalty would serve to punish him as he felt he deserved and sort of justify his killing. It was no deterrent. It was in fact an incentive to kill insofar as this one instance goes.

I have yet to hear of one case where the death penalty has served as a real deterrent and, insofar as this Senator is concerned, the only justification for the death penalty in a civilized society such as ours is to deter others from committing similar crimes. But as has been pointed out so ably by the Senator from Michigan, (Mr. LEVIN) and others who preceded me, evidence of research in this field suggests that the death penalty does not deter capital crimes.

Rather, there is evidence which shows that its repeal does not in fact increase the incidence of capital crime. That has been proven in the case of Hawaii, too, where, since the repeal of capital punishment in Hawaii, we have had no increase in capital crimes. Also, as has been pointed out, States with capital punishment do not, in fact, suffer less capital crimes than those States which do not invoke the death penalty.

What justification is there for society to take the life of one of its members? If individual members of society take the life of another, we call that murder. Why then is it not murder for society to take the life of one of its members, especially in the case of an innocent member? And as has been pointed out by others who spoke before me, there are innumerable cases where the innocent have been sent to death row.

I hold in my hand here a book entitled, "The Court of Last Resort," written by Erle Stanley Gardner. In this book he points out innumerable cases in which he was directly involved where the innocent had been sentenced to death and where in some instances just hours before the execution was to take place he had saved the innocent from execution. And other more recent cases have been pointed out here where the innocent have been put to death and received irreversible punishment to the extent that society could not in any way compensate the survivors, much less the victim.

The pending measure would reimpose punishment for serious Federal offenses while attempting to establish procedures that might pass a constitutional test for the imposition of the death sentence through State courts.

Last October we experienced the horror of a suicide mission resulting in the death of nearly 200 marines in their beds in the barracks at the Beirut Airport. Certainly this is yet another piece of evidence that death is no deterrent to determined fanatics. Yet S. 1765 seeks to impose gradations and distinctions in the seriousness of murder, placing several victims on a level of seriousness above others. This might be justified on the basis of deterrence and greater risk by nature of the victim's calling if the evidence were clear that the death penalty did in fact deter. I submit there is even less reason to believe in its deterrence for the type of victim specified in this bill.

Mr. President, all life is sacred or no life is sacred at all. The most saintly and the most deprived of us share the common bond of humanity, however bright or dim the individual sparks thereof. Nor can that bond be ranked by one's station in this life.

Ours, Mr. President, shockingly, is the only Nation in this continent with an active death penalty. In Western Europe virtually all countries have abolished it. As a free world leader in a nuclear age we would be wise not to suggest that our society harbors, collectively, the same guilt that has bred the death penalty wish in that poor murderer who fatally stabbed his wife 27 times.

I urge my colleagues who support S. 1765, with all respect for the firmness of their convictions on this issue, to reconsider their decision thoroughly in the light of what has been said here in debate. I urge my colleagues to vote against passage of S. 1765.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, will my friend from Hawaii yield?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I would be happy to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. My friend from Hawaii made a very, very poignant statement about the lack of deterrence that exists in the death penalty. I am wondering if he would mind if at this point in the RECORD I ask unanimous consent to put into the RECORD a study by the Congressional Research Service of the murder rates in States that have the death penalty compared to the murder rates in the States that do not have the death penalty. Year after year after year this shows that States that have the death penalty have twice as high a murder rate as States that do not have the death penalty.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I would be happy to have the Senator's statement and statistics inserted immediately following my statement because it in fact substantiates what I have been trying to say.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two tables that have been introduced by the Congressional Research Service and the Library of Congress be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, as a supporter of S. 1765, the capital punishment measure before us today, I want to direct the attention of my colleagues to a specific provision of the bill. It provides for the death penalty for any Federal prisoner already under life sentence who commits murder while in prison.

As things now stand, prisoners serving life terms know that courts cannot punish them further if they commit more crimes while in prison. What is another life term to a prisoner who knows he will never get out of jail? As a result, hardened criminals in our jails have been known to butcher other inmates, and even prison guards, with impunity.

Recently, in my own State of Wisconsin, we saw the tragic consequences of this problem. Boyd H. Spikerman, a Federal prison guard at the Federal Correctional Institution in Oxford, Wis., was attacked from behind and murdered on January 29. Under present law, his killer simply stays where he is now, behind bars, free to kill again. The bill we consider today would impose the death penalty on those who, like Boyd Spikerman's killer, scoff at the law from behind prison walls and commit murder.

Mr. President, I urge adoption of the death penalty legislation before us. Those who do not respect the life of another should forfeit the right to their own.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, in deliberating upon the restoration of capital punishment for certain Federal crimes, we are charged with an awesome responsibility. It is a responsibility that we must not shirk, for the issue goes to the fundamental nature of our criminal justice system and can be avoided no longer. Throughout these last several days of debate on Criminal Code reform, we have stressed that Government's most basic duty is to insure that its citizens may go about their daily lives in safety. I am convinced that in fulfilling this obligation, it is sometimes necessary and appropriate for the Government, upon sober reflection and under well specified circumstances, to impose the death penalty upon those criminals who have damaged society most severely. I support this legislation.

The constitutionality of carefully tailored statutes that provide for the death penalty is firmly established. Indeed, as the Supreme Court noted in Gregg against Georgia, the text of the Constitution itself reveals that the framers assumed that capital punishment would apply in certain cases. Others have addressed the constitutionality of this bill extensively, and the subject is closely examined in the committee report; I wish merely to note here that having carefully studied and worked on S. 1765, I believe that it sets out the appropriate definitions, does provide the requisite safeguards, and is in accord with the Constitution.

Some crimes that snatch away the lives of innocent human beings or that imperil the very existence of our democracy do in fact merit the sanction of capital punishment. The penalty is designed both to deter others from committing similar crimes in the future and to demonstrate the importance that our society attaches to innocent human life and to the right to live free from violent attack. While deterrent effect of capital punishment is not yet a matter of complete agreement among the experts, there is significant evidence bearing out the intuition most people share that the capital threat does stop some would-be criminals from committing some crimes—Isaac Ehrlich's 1973 study, for instance, concludes that every execution may prevent up to eight murders.

Prison violence provides just one specific example of our justice system's need for the deterrent effect a Federal death penalty could provide. My Subcommittee on Criminal Law recently concluded hearings showing that many criminals already serving multiple life sentences feel that they have nothing more to lose by preying on innocent prison staff members and on other inmates; some Federal institutions today house prisoners who, while incarcerated, have brutally murdered as many as three people. Without the death penalty, the Federal Government is powerless to impose any further sanctions against these killers, and the killers know it. Beyond helping to prevent additional atrocities, capital punishment serves in other ways to further the ends of justice. It is axiomatic that justice requires punishment of the guilty, and for certain types of crimes, death is the appropriate punishment. As the Gregg plurality stated:

(I)n part, capital punishment is an expression of society's moral outrage at particularly offensive conduct. This function may be unappealing to many, but it is essential in an ordered society that asks its citizens to rely on legal processes rather than self-help to vindicate their wrongs.

For too long, our criminal justice system has concentrated on the rights of wrongdoers to the neglect of the rights of crime victims and of society in general. This bill, along with a number of others that we have addressed in the last several days, works to redress that imbalance. We must make every effort to insure that criminals are dealt with fairly and in accordance with the Constitution. We must also seek to insure that those who are guilty of the most heinous crimes receive a just punishment. I urge adoption of this bill.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JEPSEN). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend past 7 p.m., in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR STAR PRINT OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 218

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a unanimous-consent request of which I have advised the minority leader.

I ask unanimous consent that Senate Joint Resolution 218 be star printed to reflect a modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

1984 FARM PROGRAM

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, since the signup period for the 1984 corn and wheat program began on January 16, 1984, many farmers have contacted me expressing various concerns about the program. The most common comment is from wheat farmers who cannot afford to divert 30 percent of their wheat base without any compensation. Even with the insurance of the target price and the loan program, the wheat farmers do not feel that they can afford to divert 30 percent of their land to participate in the program. Instead of signing up for the program, wheat farmers plan to plant fence row to fence row and hope for the best. A low signup for the wheat program will only increase the surplus of wheat and further depress already low wheat prices.

The House of Representatives has passed H.R. 4072 to modify the 1984 wheat program. H.R. 4072 would provide for a 10-percent paid diversion and 20-percent voluntary diversion program. The bill would also reduce the scheduled target price increase by one-half. The Congressional Budget Office cost savings estimate for H.R. 4072 is $3.3 billion over the next 5 years. Enactment of the program would allow farmers to depend more on the market for their income, instead of on deficiency payments from the Federal Government. If any of the program's features are changed, the signup date for the program must be extended. An extension to April 1, 1984, would provide farmers ample time to sign up. I urge my colleagues to join me in efforts to move this legislation through the Senate.

In addition to the general displeasure with the wheat program, farmers who practice a summer fallow crop rotation are concerned with acreage conservation requirements in this year's program. The summer fallow farmers divert half of their ground annually to preserve moisture for the next year's crop. Under the 1934 farm program, the summer fallow farmer must set aside 30 percent of his normal acreage to participate in the program, but he cannot use any of his summer fallow ground for conservation acreage. So in effect, the summer fallow farmer can only raise a crop on the 35 percent of his land that is neither summer fallowed nor set-aside to meet program requirements. For example, one South Dakota wheat farmer said that under the program, he could only plant 56 acres of wheat on a 160-acre farm. He has to divert 104 acres to comply. The wheat farmers in South Dakota who use summer fallow practices say that under the current conservation acreage requirement, they cannot afford to participate.

Another problem many farmers in my home State are having is with their acreage bases. Many farmers did not participate in the 1982 farm program, so they did not certify their 1982 crop acres. The acreage base for the 1984 corn and wheat program is the average planted acreage of 1982 and 1983. Unfortunately, producers who did not certify their planted acres in 1982 have only a base equal to one-half of their normal acreage. Many of these farmers can prove that they did raise a certain number of acres of corn or wheat in 1982. The Department of Agriculture can verify the planted acreage with the use of aerial photographs which are routinely taken. If a farmer can prove that he did plant the program crop in 1982, then his base should be modified to reflect that planted acreage. I have contacted Secretary of Agriculture Block concerning these problems, and urged him to take action to resolve them. The Senate must first act on the wheat program legislation, but the Secretary has the authority to make the other necessary changes in the farm programs to encourage participation.

Passage of this important farm legislation, along with some administrative changes, would make the crop diversion programs much more attractive to farmers. These changes will benefit farmers with higher prices and taxpayers with lower farm program costs.

ADVISORY COMMISSION ON PUBLIC DIPLOMACY

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, in his well-publicized memoirs, "Khrushchev Remembers," the former Soviet ruler lauds the importance of the state's official propagandist arm, "Sovinformbureau" (Soviet Bureau of Information). On page 275 he notes that Sovinformbureau and its appendages "were considered indispensable to the interests of our state, our policies, and our Communist Party."

I believe, Mr. President, we should pay particular attention to the role that Soviet propaganda officials have played and continue to play in shaping the policies of the Kremlin. As Khrushchev and other authoritative commentators on Soviet policy since him have pointed out, those directly responsible for Soviet propaganda have important input into the policymaking process.

Soviet propagandists do not merely react to the decisions of Andropov and the ruling circle, they help shape those decisions in advance with an eye toward their special needs and objectives. While the United States does not have, and does not wish to have, a propaganda agency, it does, like all governments, have a need to inform the world about the policies of the U.S. Government. Communicating those policies is the task of the U.S. Information Agency.

Since its creation during World War II, the USIA has performed much, with very little, for a great many people around the world.

In order to maintain and improve the high standards of professionalism characteristic of the USIA, the Agency recently appointed a U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy. The report of that Commission is now complete and I urge every Member of Congress to examine it carefully.

The Commission makes a careful note of the challenge posed by Soviet propaganda efforts and by Soviet jamming—jamming, I hasten to add, which continues in direct contravention of the Helsinki accords.

A number of thoughtful and important recommendations have issued from the Commission. Of particular note, I believe, is the Commission's recommendation "that USIA's capability to assess the probable reaction of foreign public opinion be utilized in the making of every major foreign policy proposed or policy options study."

I should like to direct the Senate's attention at this time to an editorial which appeared in the Wall Street Journal, January 26, 1984. It deals with the Commission's emphasis on a policy role for the USIA.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert the report and the article in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1983 REPORT OF THE UNITED STATES ADVISORY COMMISSION ON PUBLIC DIPLOMACY

[Graphs and charts mentioned throughout the report not reproducible in the RECORD.]

To the Congress and to the President of the United States:

In accordance with the requirements of Section 8, Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1977, and Public Law 96-60, the United States Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy submits herewith its annual report on the U.S. Information Agency.

Respectfully submitted,

Edwin J. Feulner, Jr., Chairman, President, The Heritage Foundation, Virginia; E. Robert (Bob) Wallach, Vice-Chairman, Lawyer-Counselor, Dean, Hastings Law School Center for Trial and Appellate Advocacy, California; Hershey Gold, Chairman of the Board, Super Yarn Mart, California; Tom C. Korologos, Vice President and Director of Legislative Affairs, Timmons and Company, Inc., Virginia; Olin Robinson, Professor of Political Science, President, Middlebury College, Vermont; Leonard L. Silverstein, Attorney; Partner, Silverstein & Mullens, President, National Symphony Orchestra Association (1980-83), Chief Editor, Tax Management, Maryland; Mae Sue Talley, Retired Business Executive, Publisher and Civic Leader, Arizona.

A MESSAGE FROM THE CHAIRMAN

Public diplomacy has come of age.

During the last several years, as foreign policy decisions have been seen to have a direct impact on American politics and the economy, the role of public diplomacy has been substantially heightened. In recognition of this fact, the importance of the U.S. Information Agency within the foreign affairs community has been correspondingly increased.

This Administration, with the Commission's strong support, has undertaken a long-term commitment to augment USIA's financial resources and modernize its facilities. It is heartening to those who believe in the importance of public diplomacy that the long-time "starvation diet" of the Agency has been to some extent overcome, particularly at a time of great pressure to reduce federal spending. Funding levels have increased in the last three years, although measured in constant dollars, the Agency still operates at a substantially lower budget level than it enjoyed in its peak post war years.

Effective communication of American policies and values is an important tool for the policymaker. There are severe limitations on military action in virtually any foreign policy crisis. Similarly, concerted economic action is difficult because of domestic political considerations and because coordinated action among allies is often difficult to achieve. Thus, public diplomacy often becomes the most appropriate, indeed sometimes the only, course of action available to our policymakers.

However, public diplomacy is important in its own right not just as the "other option." As Disraeli said, "It is with words that we govern men." The role of semantics is critical in any battle of ideas. This Commission has expended considerable effort during the past year on this issue, and we invite public discussion of the subject.

My colleagues and I have traveled throughout the world a great deal during the past several years, and we have talked with many USIA officers and American ambassadors. We have also met with a number of senior foreign policymakers in Washington. We have been consistently impressed by the quality of USIA personnel and the high regard in which they are held by others in the foreign affairs community. Their ability to reach foreign opinion leaders, to explain the subtle nuances of American foreign policy, to convey the universal regard that Americans of all political persuasions have for our system of government, and their ability to respond quickly with official U.S. Government views on fastbreaking events make the USIA professional an essential part of the American foreign policy process.

Much of USIA's work is not new. It includes time-tested techniques which are used by our allies and adversaries as well: exchange programs, foreign radio broadcasting, television, magazines, books, libraries and cultural centers, and many other activities which are discussed and evaluated in this report.

The current Administration, and particularly USIA Director Charles Z. Wick, have brought new energy and a renewed sense of purpose to the Agency. Director Wick, while occasionally criticized for his personal style, has nonetheless brought the Agency to the forefront of U.S. foreign affairs. New initiatives, such as "Euronet" (satellite television links to embassies in Europe), modernization of the Voice of America, youth exchanges, and substantial expansion of educational exchange programs, have led to a heightened sense of the importance and relevance of the mission of USIA.

Director Wick has opened up USIA to new ideas and new people. Private sector advisory committees have brought some of the best minds from America's private sector to the work of public diplomacy. Their ideas have been a positive stimulus to USIA.

Certain policy and managerial changes have raised criticism as well as support among members of Congress and the national news media. While this Commission has been alert to such criticism, it is our judgment that the improvements have far outweighed whatever shortcomings might be seen in the Agency.

The communication skills and advisory capabilities of USIA today are being more effectively utilized. Their full use in the making of foreign policy—as well as in policy implementation—will not be realized until the Director of the U.S. Information Agency participates regularly as a statutory advisor to the National Security Council. This is a recommendation which the Commission has made previously. We strongly endorse it again this year.

The United States Information Agency is effectively carrying out its legislative mandate. We commend this report to everyone interested in public diplomacy.

EDWIN J. FEULNER, Jr., Chairman.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

The role of USIA and public diplomacy

The Commission recommends that a Presidential Directive be issued implementing Congressional intent that the Director of USIA serve as a statutory advisor to the National Security Council and as the principal advisor to the President on foreign public opinion and the conduct of public diplomacy.

The Commission recommends that a task force be created under the National Security Council to assess the problem of semantics in the international "war of words" and propose an institutionalized means to counter misleading terminology and increase the accuracy of international political discourse.

The Commission recommends that USIA's capability to assess the probable reaction of foreign public opinion be utilized in the making of every major foreign policy proposal or policy options study.

Voice of America

The Commission believes it is urgent and essential that the U.S. do more to ensure that the Voice of America can deliver a strong, reliable signal worldwide.

The Commission recommends that VOA give a higher priority to research and development on direct satellite broadcasting (DBS) technology.

The Commission recommends that a Special Representative of the President with the rank of ambassador be appointed to coordinate U.S. Government activities relating to the negotiations of VOA transmitter site agreements.

The Commission believes that placing Radio Marti within the Voice of America is questionable public policy that sets a precedent of uncertain consequence. The Commission recommends that USIA take care to ensure that VOA's Charter is not compromised, that Radio Marti meets the highest standards of accuracy and objectivity, and that it not become the voice of any single segment of American society.

Research

The Commission recommends that the staff and budget of the Office of Research be increased substantially to provide the research capability required for national security and foreign policy needs and for the regular and methodical evaluation of Agency programs and products.

Exhibits

The Commission recommends that USIA strengthen American cultural and political presence through an expanded exhibits program in Western Europe and the Third World.

Private sector programs

The Commission recommends that Congress not extend the requirement that it be notified fifteen days in advance of all USIA program grants.

The Commission recommends that USIA seek and encourage promising new organizations to participate in its grant programs. Effective, traditionally-funded organizations, subject to careful scrutiny and periodic review, should continue to play a central role in multiplying what can be accomplished through government programs.

Donated books

The Commission recommends that Congress enact legislation increasing the tax deduction for donated books to increase the incentive for publishers to donate books for USIA program use.

English teaching

The Commission recommends that the Agency strengthen its English teaching programs and give increased support to Binational Centers.

THE COMMISSION: WHAT IT IS AND WHAT IT DOES

For more than a generation, it has been the intent of Congress that a bipartisan group of citizens, drawn from a broad cross section of professional backgrounds, should bring informed and independent judgment to bear on America's public diplomacy. To this end, it has established the U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy to conduct a continuing overview of the activities of the United States Information Agency.[1]

It is the task of the Commission to recommend policies and programs in support of USIA's mission and principal activities. The Commission is required to assess the work of the Agency and to report its findings and recommendations to the President, the Congress, the Secretary of State, the Director of USIA, and to the American people.

We approach these responsibilities with a sobering sense of their magnitude and in the unanimous conviction that public diplomacy is indispensable to our national security.

USIA is an agency in transition. Begun in World War II, it has been forced for decades to compete in the war of ideas with inadequate resources and obsolete equipment. Today, this is changing. Both in government and among the American people there is an increasing sense that "ideas have consequences"—that using communications technology to shape opinions is as important as maintaining a strong national defense.

The results are impressive:

A heightened role for the Agency in the conduct of foreign policy.

New approaches to USIA's traditional information programs and to the administration of international educational and cultural exchange programs.

A creative sensitivity to the potential of communications satellites and state-of-the-art technology in television programming.

A systematic and long overdue effort to modernize the facilities of the Voice of America.

And above all awareness at the highest levels of American government that public diplomacy is an essential ingredient in the conduct of foreign affairs.

The Commission has been an active partner with USIA in bringing these changes about.

Oversight activities

The Commission believes it can best carry out its oversight responsibilities by thoroughly informing itself on what USIA is doing now and what its plans are for the future. This means taking the time to listen to those engaged in and knowledgeable about the conduct of public diplomacy.

During the past year the Commission met at least once a month and, as required, more frequently. It held regular hearings in Washington with USIA Director Charles Z. Wick and his senior associates. In addition it met with members of USIA's Congressional committees and their staffs, senior officials in the White House and the Department of State, and with numerous public and private sector communications professionals.[2]

Members of the Commission have also visited many of USIA's overseas posts for a firsthand look at the Agency's field activities. During 1983, its seven members visited 25 posts and discussed public diplomacy problems and programs with some 20 U.S. Ambassadors and more than 50 senior USIA officers. Many of these post visits were privately financed. Commission members also participated in regional conferences for USIA's Public Affairs Officers in Africa and East Asia. A meeting of the full Commission was held with members of the United States delegation to the United Nations in New York.

Legislative activities

Making its views known to Congress is an important part of the Commission's statutory responsibilities. It does so through meetings with members of USIA's authorization and appropriations committees and through letters and reports. At appropriate stages in the legislative process this year, the Commission expressed its views to members of Congress and their staffs on USIA's budget, the need to modernize the Voice of America, Project Democracy, the accreditation of the Voice of America's Capitol Hill correspondents, and legislation to establish Radio Marti within the Voice of America.

The Commission took a leading role in seeking accreditation by the Congressional media galleries for the Voice of America's news correspondents. For decades, denial of accreditation had been based on the argument that VOA is a government-funded agency and therefore not a legitimate news organization. At the same time, however, Congress for many years has permitted numerous other government-funded news agencies to be accredited as exceptions to House and Senate rules—Tass, Radio Moscow, the BBC, Radio France International, and East German Radio, among others.

Struck by this double standard, the Commission brought the accreditation issue to the attention of the Senate Rules Committee and other members of the Senate. In testimony before the Committee, the Commission pointed out that VOA is a legitimate news organization required by law to be an "accurate, comprehensive and objective source of news." Lack of accreditation, in the Commission's view, gives intellectual ammunition to America's adversaries who characterize VOA as a propaganda arm of incumbent administrations, while the legitimacy of their own government-supported and controlled press agencies is enhanced by having received U.S. Capitol press credentials.

The Commission is pleased that as a result of the hearings and discussions with members of the Senate Rules Committee and members of the Congressional Radio-Television Galleries, VOA correspondents finally have been granted long overdue accreditation and full access to the proceedings of Congress.

Public diplomacy activities

In addition to their advisory responsibilities, Commission members have contributed directly to the achievement of public diplomacy objectives. Some have undertaken speaking engagements with foreign audiences on topics relevant to USIA's country plan objectives. Commission members occassionally grant media interviews while abroad and engage in personal contact with influential decision-makers in foreign countries.

Members have also represented the U.S. Government in such ceremonial activities as the launching of the Tricentennial of the first German settlement in the United States in Krefeld, Germany; the opening of USIA's "American Theater Today" exhibit in Athens; the opening of new USIS facilities in Sri Lanka; and the opening of an American graphics exhibit in Tel Aviv.

The Commission has taken an activist approach to its responsibilities because it believes informed private citizens can contribute to the development of sound public policy. The Commission is also deeply committed to the importance of foreign attitudes in achieving U.S. foreign policy objectives and to the significance of public diplomacy.

The report which follows sets forth the Commission's principal findings and concerns over the past year.

THE ROLE OF USIA AND PUBLIC DIPLOMACY

Recommendations

The Commission recommends that a Presidential Directive be issued implementing Congressional intent that the Director of USIA serve as a statutory advisor to the National Security Council and as the principal advisor to the President on foreign public opinion and the conduct of public diplomacy.

The Commission recommends that a task force be created under the National Security Council to assess the problem of semantics in the international "war of words" and propose an institutionalized means to counter misleading terminology and increase the accuracy of international political discourse.

The Commission recommends that USIA's capability to assess the probable reaction of foreign public opinion be utilized in the making of every major foreign policy proposal or policy options study.

No one in a democratic society—certainly no elected official—would question the importance of public opinion or the power of ideas. Yet these facts, unchallenged in our domestic affairs, are often forgotten or slighted in the conduct of our relations with other countries. They are, however, the concern of public diplomacy and USIA whose role is to explain the motivations, actions and policies of the American people to an often skeptical world.

[1] The U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy was established in 1978 as the successor to two advisory bodies—the U.S. Advisory Commission on Information for the U.S. Information Agency and the U.S. Advisory Commission on International Educational and Cultural Affairs for the former Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs in the Department of State. The Commission by law carries out the functions of its predecessors as well as additional responsibilities set forth in Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1977.

President Reagan has nominated Priscilla L. Buckley, Richard M. Scaife, and Herbert Schmertz to be members of the Commission, succeeding Leonard L. Silverstein, Mae Sue Talley, and Olin Robinson whose terms have expired.

[2] Among others, the Commission met with former Assistants to the President for National Security Affairs William P. Clark and Richard V. Allen, Deputy Secretary of State Kenneth Dam, Representative Dante B. Fascell, Arms Control and Disarmament Agency Director Kenneth Adelman, Under Secretary of State William Schneider, State Department Counselor Edward Derwinski, Ambassador John Holdridge, Deputy USUN Ambassador Charles Lichenstein, Ambassador Max Kampelman, Assistant Secretary of State Chester Crocker, Ambassador Thomas Enders, Ambassador Otto Reich, Chairman of the Board for International Broadcasting Frank Shakespeare, and former CBS President Frank Stanton.

This is no small task. Even the most casual observer of foreign affairs must be aware of the troubled state of U.S.-European relations, to cite only one problem area. European public have expressed, indeed often demonstrated, their misapprehensions and criticisms of the U.S. over nuclear and strategic matters and the deployment of new U.S. medium range missiles in Europe. There are sharp differences over monetary, trade and agricultural export policies. Much of the European media and public opinion is hostile to U.S. policies in Central America. Public opinion polls show a decline in respect for American leadership. Some of these issues reflect divergent national interests, but some stem from misunderstandings and others are fanned into controversies by Communist-planted "disinformation."

Words and foreign policy

Perhaps the most serious type of "disinformation" sown by the Communists over the years is that which Under Secretary of Defense Fred C. Ikle and Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan have termed "semantic infiltration," i.e., the systematic distortion of the meaning of certain words to confuse or mislead.[3] The Communists seem to have followed the lead of Humpty Dumpty, who explained to Alice, "When I use a word it means just what I choose it to mean."[4]

In just this way Soviet propagandists have corrupted such powerfully positive words as "people," "liberation," "peace," and "democratic," and used them to describe movements and governments whose goals and structures are the antithesis of their names. Any opposing movement or government is usually labeled fascist or imperialist. The efforts of democratic nations to counter this have been sporadic and unsystematic, and we have even fallen into the trap of using Communist terminology ourselves, as in, for example, the German Democratic Republic.

Regrettably, there is no "truth-in-labeling" required of speeches by political leaders. If there were, it would help people everywhere to perceive and understand the meaning of world events more accurately. It would also raise the level and accuracy of international political discourse. This Commission believes that both Administration and Congressional leaders must be made more aware of the crucial importance of semantics in the "war of words." If our adversaries insist on following Humpty Dumpty's rule, then they must be called to account for their distortions.

We believe the times require a conscious effort to improve the accuracy and political impact of words and terms used by our leaders in speaking to the world. By so doing, they can help disclose the hypocrisy and distortions of hostile propaganda. This is not a problem that will go away, and we must be prepared to deal with it on a systematic and continuing basis.

The Commission recommends that a task force be created, under the National Security Council and including representatives of the Departments of State and Defense and USIA, to assess the problem and propose an institutionalized means to respond to inaccurate or misleading terminology in international political discourse.

Resources

The role of USIA is not to manipulate, but to try to ensure that foreign perceptions of the U.S. are accurate and to correct misinformation and misunderstandings. Public diplomacy, wisely and skillfully used, can lessen the possibility of confrontation and conflict, but as we have pointed out in past reports, it has for years been woefully underfunded.

The Commission is encouraged by recent indications that the U.S. Government is beginning, albeit slowly in certain quarters, to recognize the importance of public diplomacy. A recent House Foreign Affairs Committee report noted the significance of information and educational exchange programs "has long been overlooked by U.S. policy makers." The Committee added:

"The United States has lagged behind those nations that compete with the United States in the dissemination of ideas, both in content and in technology used to deliver that message. The committee hopes that the recommended increases will be used to enable the Agency to play a greater role in promoting U.S. national security and a more forceful role in the ongoing war of ideas."[5]

After 15 years of declining budgets (measured in constant dollars) and personnel levels Congress, acting in response to an Administration request, appropriated a total of $578 million for FY 1983 for USIA, an increase of $82 million over the previous year. For FY 1984, the White House authorized a USIA request to Congress of $711 million.

In a year of severe budget restraints, Congress actually appropriated $660 million for USIA for FY 1984. (This includes $10 million for Radio Marti and $18 million for the National Endowment for Democracy, both new programs outside the Agency's traditional activities.) While considerably less than the Agency's request, it is nevertheless a solid increase over the previous year's budget. This Commission has long urged the expansion of USIA's resources. Consequently, we take much satisfaction from this action by the Congress which reflects a growing commitment to public diplomacy.

Special planning group

In previous reports, this Commission also stated its conviction that public diplomacy is an indispensable element in our national security. We were heartened when President Reagan signed a National Security Decision Directive (NSDD 77)[6] to strengthen the organization, planning and coordination of public diplomacy activities.

NSDD 77 established a Special Planning Group (SPG) responsible for the overall direction of a wide-ranging program of public diplomacy activities. It is chaired by the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs and consists of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Director of USIA, the Director of the Agency for International Development, and the Assistant to the President for Communications.

Four interagency standing committees operate under the guidance of the SPG:

The International Information Committee is chaired by a senior representative of USIA. A senior State Department officer serves as vice chairman. It is responsible for planning, coordinating and implementing international information activities in support of U.S. policies and national interests.

The International Political Committee is chaired by a senior representative of the Department of State. A senior officer of USIA serves as vice chairman. It is responsible for planning, coordinating and implementing international political activities in support of U.S. policies and national security interests.

It also plans activities to support the growth of democratic values and political institutions abroad, as proposed in the President's Westminster speech in London on June 8, 1982, and develops strategies to counter totalitarian ideologies.

The International Broadcasting Committee is responsible for the planning and coordination of international broadcasting activities sponsored by the U.S. Government, including the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty.

The Public Affairs Committee is responsible for the planning and coordination of U.S. Government domestic public affairs activities relating to foreign policy and national security issues.

This rather complicated and interlocking committee structure is in place and functioning. The senior body, the SPG, met several times last year, and among other things directed the formation of a new interagency committee on arms control. The International Information and International Political Committees meet biweekly on alternate weeks. As one senior USIA official told the Commission: "We are beginning to sense that the government realizes that public diplomacy matters."

As a result of NSDD 77, a mechanism now exists that should make for more effective coordination in explaining and implementing U.S. foreign policies. It also ensures that the specialized resources and skills of USIA will play an important role in the process.

In its last report this Commission stated that "the Agency could perform a valuable and much-needed service by advising the government on the public presentation of its foreign policies and by actively participating in the coordination of administration statements announcing or explaining U.S. policies." This new interagency committee structure should permit that, and should help the U.S. Government to speak with one voice in foreign affairs. We see this as an important step forward.

Importance of public opinion

Advising and participating in the public presentation of foreign policies which have already been decided upon is a satisfactory solution to only part of the problem. As our previous report pointed out, "America's experiences in Vietnam, Iran, and now in Europe and Latin America show clearly that foreign cultures, attitudes, and opinions must routinely be taken seriously into account in formulating U.S. foreign policy" (emphasis added). A close reading of NSDD 77 reveals no intent to accord USIA a regular advisory role in the making of foreign policy. And from what we have been told by senior Agency officials, USIA is still rarely afforded the opportunity to participate in an advisory capacity when policies are being developed. The Agency's specialized knowledge and understanding of foreign cultures and attitudes, and its ability to survey attitudinal trends and measure foreign public opinion remain a sadly underutilized resource by our government.

An assessment of the probable reaction of foreign public opinion should be an integral part of every major foreign policy proposal or policy options study. USIA has the capability to provide this on a regular basis. We urge that it be used.

National security council

The Commission noted with satisfaction last year that USIA's role in the foreign affairs community had been substantially expanded through the energetic leadership of Director Charles Z. Wick. We stated our conviction that this more active role must be institutionalized to ensure the regular participation of the Agency in the formulation and execution of American foreign policy. That is still our conviction.

After a careful study of the various ways in which this might be accomplished, including a review of earlier reports and recommendations made by previous Commissions, the Comptroller General, members of Congress, and several ad hoc task forces appointed by Presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy, we concluded, as they did, that USIA should participate regularly on the National Security Council. This does not necessarily require formal membership.

Membership on the Council is limited by law to the President, the Vice President, and the Secretaries of State and Defense. However, the legislation that created the NSC provided that it would have both members and advisors. The Director of the Central Intelligence Agency and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have been designated statutory advisors. As a result, both regularly participate in the meetings of the NSC and, of equal or greater importance, in the NSC interagency working groups, for it is in these groups that the policy options are developed.

USIA already has a legal responsibility to serve as an advisor to the NSC. Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1977 states:

"The Agency shall be headed by the Director . . . who shall serve as the principal advisor to the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of State on the functions vested in the Director."

Thus, the law which created the Agency confers upon the Director of USIA the same advisory status with respect to the NSC as that of the Director of CIA and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Congressional intent is clear. The statute needs only to be implemented by a Presidential directive to formalize the Agency's role and designate the Director of USIA a statutory advisor to the NSC. The Commission recommends that this be done.

MEDIA AND PROGRAMS

Voice of America: Recommendations

The Commission believes it is urgent and essential that the U.S. do more to ensure that the Voice of America can deliver a strong, reliable signal worldwide.

The Commission recommends that VOA give a higher priority to research and development on direct satellite broadcasting (DBS) technology.

The Commission recommends that a Special Representative of the President with the rank of ambassador be appointed to coordinate U.S. Government activities relating to the negotiation of VOA transmitter site agreements.

The Commission believes that placing Radio Marti within the Voice of America is questionable public policy that sets a precedent of uncertain consequence. The Commission recommends that USIA take care to ensure that VOA's Charter is not compromised, that Radio Marti meets the highest standards of accuracy and objectivity, and that it not become the voice of any single segment of American society.

The Voice of America is the international radio of the U.S. Government. VOA broadcasts news, balanced programs on American thought and culture, and explanations of U.S. policies worldwide to a regular weekly audience of more than 100 million listeners. With a current budget of approximately $150 million and a staff of almost 3,000, VOA is the largest and best known part of USIA.

As President Reagan noted in his radio address to the American people on the Korean Airlines tragedy:

"The truth is mankind's best hope for a better world. That's why in times like this, few assets are more important than the Voice of America and Radio Liberty, our primary means of getting the truth to the Russian people.

"Within minutes of the report of the Soviet destruction of the Korean jet, the Voice of America aired the story on its news programs around the globe. We made sure people in Africa, Asia, the Middle East, Europe and, most important, the people in the Soviet bloc itself knew the truth.

"Accurate news like this is about as welcome as the plague among the Soviet elite. The Soviets spend more to block Western broadcasts coming into those countries than the entire worldwide budget of the Voice of America."[7]

Because of VOA's importance to U.S. national security policy, the Commission has examined its activities and plans for the future with care. We are both pleased and concerned.

We are pleased because a historical pattern of neglect of this national resource has been arrested and hopefully reversed. A recent National Security Council review of the government's international broadcasting capabilities led to a Presidential commitment to modernize VOA's antiquated and obsolete facilities and to expand and significantly improve its language services and geographic coverage.

This commitment, which takes into account past recommendations of this Commission, the General Accounting Office and others, has found resonance among responsible members of Congress in both parties. Increased public awareness of VOA's needs is helping to shape a consensus of support for needed improvements.

VOA program developments

The Commission is also encouraged by a number of recent program developments at the Voice.

Three new language services have been established—Amharic (Ethiopia), Azerbaijani (Soviet Union), and Pashto (Afghanistan)—bringing the total number of VOA languages to 42. The Pashto Service, together with Dari and Farsi, gives VOA direct radio access to all major population groups in Afghanistan. VOA's Polish broadcasting has increased from 2½ to 7 hours daily.

Daily VOA editorials, now broadcast on all language services, explain and advocate official government policies. The Commission finds this to be a positive development. Lively and vigorous, the editorials provide a welcome new format for carrying out VOA's statutory obligation to "present the policies of the United States clearly and effectively."

VOA is improving its program review process. Coherent program and production procedures are being instituted for the first time for all language services. Higher standards for news content, format, and general broadcast practices are being established.

The introduction of computer technology, long considered essential in the news rooms of America's commercial media, has substantially improved the speed, productivity, and accuracy of VOA's news operations.

An office of audience relations has been created to increase analysis of listener mail and overseas awareness of VOA. With the Commission's encouragement, VOA is for the first time publishing an audience magazine. The new bimonthly periodical, called Voice, includes VOA program guides and feature articles that amplify and make more understandable major VOA program themes. The Commission urges Congress to pass legislation permitting this publication to be sold within the United States.

And the separate VOA personnel office established in 1980 has done much to upgrade the quality of recruitment and personnel administration.

In its 1982 report, the Commission recommended that USIA take greater care to avoid actions and policies that can be easily misinterpreted and cast doubt on VOA's commitment to accuracy and objectivity. Substantial progress has been made. Leadership continuity and increased emphasis on broadcasting professionalism have helped put to rest the fears of some that VOA's credibility is being damaged. The Commission is aware of no evidence that VOA's statutory obligation to broadcast news that is "accurate, objective and comprehensive" has been compromised.

VOA modernization

These are all welcome developments. At the same time, improvements in programming and administration avail little if VOA is unable to deliver a strong reliable signal worldwide.

The Commission is concerned that the U.S. is still doing far less than it can to ensure that the Voice of America becomes and remains technologically competitive. In President Reagan's words: "We are as far behind the Soviets and their allies in international broadcasting today as we were in space when they launched Sputnik in 1957."[8]

More than 35 percent of VOA's transmitters are 30 years old or older. Some equipment predates World War II. Overseas, VOA uses up to 250 KW transmitters only, whereas there are now 96 "superpower" 500 KW transmitters in use by other countries with more under construction. Some 123 countries now broadcast in shortwave, and a crowded high frequency spectrum makes it increasingly difficult for VOA to deliver a signal that can be easily heard. Soviet jamming compounds the problem.

The Commission appreciates the political and technological difficulties of modernizing in a highly competitive international broadcasting environment at a time when budget constraints exist and communications technology is changing rapidly. VOA wisely began the task by commissioning a series of preliminary engineering studies covering antenna systems, technical transmission requirements, worldwide power generation requirements, station characteristics and locations, and a worldwide operations center and network control. The absence of such long-range planning in the past led to piecemeal projects, numerous delays, major project changes, and extensive budgetary reprogramming.

[7] Radio Address of the President to the Nation, September 10, 1983.

[8] Ibid., p. 13.

In the Commission's view, the economic and technical decisions underlying VOA modernization ought to be guided by four fundamental principles.

Redundancy and Dispersal of Facilities

Conventional shortwave broadcasting, according to recent estimates, will be VOA's primary medium of communication for the foreseeable future.

Most experts agree that transmitters in the U.S. alone cannot send a competitive signal to much of Europe and Asia or to parts of Africa and South America. To supplement its U.S. transmitters, VOA maintains 16 stations around the world to relay shortwave and some medium wave signals. This network, which has a current replacement value of about $2 billion, has serious deficiencies. In critical areas of the world VOA can be heard only with difficulty, if at all. VOA's construction program seeks to address these needs.

Overseas transmitter sites, however, are vulnerable. Political uncertainties and the possibility of sabotage are risk factors that must inform VOA's decision-making. Back-up transmission sites, redundant facilities, contingency plans, augmented U.S. transmitter capability, and new flexible antenna technology are essential if the U.S. is to cope adequately with the problem of vulnerability.

The Commission is aware that this approach is costly. But it is founded on the reasonable premise that national security, not broadcasting economy, should govern the decisions of Congress and the Executive Branch.

Alternative Technologies

The Commission is persuaded that VOA must vigorously explore a variety of approaches to delivering its signal.

Superpower 500 KW transmitters are one approach to modernization, and many countries have adopted it. The Soviet Union now has more than 30 such transmitters. West Germany has nine. Even countries such as Gabon and Libya have four each. It may be that the U.S. should construct some 500 KW transmitters. The Commission finds persuasive, however, arguments that simply increasing transmitter power is not the only answer to VOA's needs.

A recent MIT study suggests the cost of using 500 KW transmitters is high, with the newest using about 40 to 56 percent more power than comparable 250 KW transmitters[9] technical and safety problems also increase with higher voltage output. The MIT study concludes that an alternative way to obtain higher power is to use an array of multiple transmitters and multiple antennas to produce a single broadcast beam. New antenna technology also permits selective increases in signal levels and focused broadcasting to high population and crisis areas.

VOA should make every effort to increase retransmission of its programs by FM, medium wave, and cable where local conditions permit. Packaged programs, land line feeds, and direct satellite broadcasting for retransmission to receivers located in selected local medium wave stations are options that should be vigorously pursued. VOA should also take greater advantage of the worldwide expansion in audio cassettes by increasing direct distribution of VOA cassettes as well as making them available to broadcasters and cablecasters

The Commission is also convinced of the importance of developing and marketing improved HF receivers. Research in the design of high quality, economical shortwave receivers should be encouraged.

Finally, the Commission believes that VOA must give a higher priority to research and development on direct satellite broadcasting (DBS). USIA's recent contract with NASA to begin exploratory studies of this option is a useful but modest first step. Decisions at ITU Administrative Radio Conferences in the coming years will greatly influence adaptation to DBS technology. The U.S. must take care that it is well prepared for and adequately represented at these conferences. And while the U.S. should be prepared to think in terms of shared channels and common carrier approaches that will assure opportunities to other broadcasters, all such discussions must be viewed in the context of the essential right of VOA to broadcast without censorship or regulation.

Automation

Much of what VOA now does manually can be automated. A start has been made in the editing and distribution of news and other program materials. Frequency scheduling and the determination of broadcast schedules is another important VOA function which is labor intensive and involves the prediction of propagation patterns six to eight months in advance. Better signal monitoring and measurement combined with more advanced computer-based scheduling would permit short-term frequency adjustments to day-to-day conditions. The Commission believes VOA should make the automation of frequency scheduling a high priority.

VOA should also explore the possibilities of station automation. Completely automated, unattended sites may not be desirable given security, fuel and remote site maintenance considerations, but VOA should look carefully at the cost benefits to be derived form increased automation.

Site Negotiations

The importance to VOA's modernization plans of successful bilateral negotiations with foreign governments cannot be understated. The need to renew existing relay station agreements occurs periodically. The U.S. is currently negotiating agreements with the governments of Greece, Botswana, and Sri Lanka. VOA is seeking Congressional authorization for additional sites in the Middle East, the Persian Gulf, the Western Mediterranean, the Far East, Europe, and the Caribbean.

The stakes are high. Foreign governments are aware that real estate is essential to U.S. international broadcasting, and demands are made accordingly. VOA has operated in Greece since 1979 without a renewal agreement. Negotiations for additional facilities in Sri Lanka have been long and difficult.

The Commission is concerned that while the importance of site negotiations has been recognized by senior officials responsible for U.S. national security policy, the staffing and carrying out of these negotiations has not been given the priority they deserve. The appointment of a senior USIA career officer as Special Coordinator for International Negotiations is a start in the right direction. Given the magnitude of the task, however, the commission recommends that a Special Representative of the President with the rank of ambassador be appointed to oversee all activities of the U.S. Government with respect to the negotiation of international transmitter site agreements for the Voice of America.

The Commission is sympathetic to the magnitude of the modernization tasks facing the Voice of America. VOA's announced plans are to seek and spend $1.5 billion during the next six years on the modernization of its broadcasting facilities. Planning, research and development are essential to doing the job wisely, but in our view it is time to move quickly to the "bricks and mortar" before audiences are lost to more aggressive competitors. We urge the Congress to grant the resources that are needed and at the same time to be probing in its oversight to see that they are spent well.

Radio Marti

Compromise legislation that for the first time places a surrogate broadcasting service within the Voice of America was signed into law on October 4, 1983. The legislation established Radio Marti, a Cuba Service within VOA to be administered separately from other VOA functions for the primary purpose of broadcasting news about Cuba to Cuba.[10]

Radio Marti's mission will differ significantly from VOA's historic mission, which is to broadcast news about the U.S. and world events, information about significant American thought and institutions, and statements of official U.S. policy. The head of Radio Marti will report directly to the Director of USIA and the Director of the Voice of America.

The Commission believes the decision to put Radio Marti in the Voice of America is questionable public policy. It sets a precedent of uncertain consequence that could cast doubt on VOA's most important and fragile asset—its credibility.

In saying this, we do not mean to suggest that Radio Marti will necessarily be any less dedicated to truth and objectivity than VOA. The purposes of surrogate broadcasting, however, differ a great deal from those of the radio voice of the U.S. Government. And these purposes are perceived very differently throughout the world. The appropriate organizational location for Radio Marti is with Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty under the Board for International Broadcasting.

The Commission is persuaded that the intent of Congress is that VOA's Charter not be compromised, that Radio Marti meet the highest standards of accuracy and objectivity, and that it not become the voice of any single segment of American society.[11]

The Commission intends to monitor closely the implementation of the legislation and the activities of Radio Marti and its Advisory Board with a view toward maintaining a strong, credible and highly professional Voice of America.

Television service

Of all the media used by USIA, television has the greatest potential popular appeal and is perhaps the most powerful means of communicating with foreign audiences when it is used well.

Until recently, however, television was something of a stepchild in USIA. The Agency was uncertain as to how to use it or even where it belonged (it has at times been awkwardly attached to the Voice of America). There was an urgent need, as this Commission pointed out last year, for a qualified professional to direct the Television and Film Service. Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that television has been slow to develop its potential within the Agency.

This is now changing. The Commission is encouraged by progress already achieved and efforts to make more extensive and effective use of this powerful medium. An experienced television professional was brought in as director of the Service which was subsequently made a separate element in the Agency, giving it the prominence it deserves.

One of the first changes of the new management was the introduction of marketing concepts to attack a basic problem: how to get the product shown. Whereas VOA broadcasts directly to its listeners, television programs must be filtered through the managers and editors of foreign television stations. In the future, it may be possible for USIA to telecast directly into homes, but now it is necessary to offer a product that can compete for time in the highly competitive, sophisticated world of international television broadcasting. A new marketing division hopes to accomplish this by employing basic research, market segmentation, audience evaluation and careful planning.

Satellite File

Efforts are also being made to develop new distribution outlets for USIA's television products. An interesting innovation with much promise is the weekly Satellite File, a half-hour reel of short news and features. This is fed from the Agency's Washington studios to two commercial international TV news services which include this material in their own files. It then is transmitted to some 275 stations in 80 countries around the world. Copies of the Satellite File are also hand-delivered to a number of Washington-based foreign TV correspondents who incorporate some of the clips in reports to their home stations.

Tracking the use of Satellite File programs is proving to be difficult. They are apparently being used with some regularity in Latin America and the Far East, but infrequently so far in Europe where the members of the European Broadcasting Union have been reluctant to use USIA material. Nevertheless, the Satellite File has become a worldwide product. Slightly more than a million dollars was spent on the File in FY 1983, and $3.4 million has been requested for FY 1984.

The Satellite File is an excellent concept. Whether it can break into the European market, or whether its usage in other areas will be great enough to make it cost-effective remains to be seen. The effort is encouraging, and the Commission will follow this experiment with interest.

Foreign TV Press

During the past year cooperative productions and facilitative assistance have assumed increasing importance. The Co-production Unit has tripled in size. It assists visiting foreign television teams in covering news events and producing documentaries on politics, economics, defense, science and the arts. European stations, which seldom use USIA-produced material, welcome the Agency's cooperation in producing their own. The Unit responds to an average of 12 requests per week from foreign producers for facilitative assistance.

Television is also being effectively used by the Agency's Foreign Press Centers, whose potential importance for explaining U.S. policies to foreign audiences has finally been realized. At Director Wick's invitation, senior Administration policy-makers now routinely come to press centers in Washington, New York and Los Angeles to brief the foreign press corps on U.S. views and policies. The Agency has assigned experienced producers, with minicam crews on call, to assist the foreign TV press. They provide video pool coverage of "on-the-record" press briefings, arrange for and record one-on-one TV interviews with high-level officials on current issues, arrange for stock footage and research, and offer reels of short news clips on important subjects to correspondents for use on foreign news programs.

Interviews are also videotaped at USIA's studios when more elaborate sets or arrangements are required: for example, a video dialogue between Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger in Washington and European correspondents at NATO headquarters in Brussels. Special interviews by foreign correspondents were also videotaped with Secretary of Agriculture John Block, Special Trade Representative William Brock, Deputy Secretary of State Kenneth Dam and Dr. Henry Kissinger, among many others.

All of President Reagan's major policy speeches have been transmitted by satellite. USIA also played a major role in assisting the foreign press at the Williamsburg Summit. And prior to Vice President Bush's trips to Europe and North Africa, the Agency taped press conferences with the Vice President and members of the foreign press. These were followed with a series of one-on-one interviews with journalists from the countries he was to visit. The interviews were then sent by satellite to guarantee timely arrival.

The result of these efforts is more accurate information about the United States, its policies and political processes, presented in the news and documentary television programs of foreign countries.

Following the shooting down of the Korean airliner, the Television Service, working around the clock, prepared videotapes using the voices of the Soviet pilots. These were shown on monitors in the United Nations Security Council chamber during Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick's dramatic debate with the Soviet Ambassador—the first use of television in a U.N. Security Council meeting. The historic and extremely effective presentation was featured prominently by U.S. and foreign TV networks to an audience of many millions. The Commission commends USIA for its initiative in this innovative use of the medium.

To take advantage of advances in communications technology, the Television Service has undergone extensive technical modernization. It now has complete compatibility with international television standards and enhanced program flexibility. It has acquired in-house capability to convert U.S. videotapes to different world commercial standards. For an initial investment of $55,000 in conversion equipment, the Agency and the American taxpayer now save more than $150,000 per year in outside contracts.

Euronet

In November 1983, the Agency inaugurated "Euronet," a one-way video, two-way audio link via commercial satellite and European ground stations with five embassies in Western Europe. Other embassies will soon be added to the net. This provides four hours of direct satellite broadcasting each week, putting U.S. spokesmen and policymakers in direct contact with embassy officers, host country officials, and opinion makers.

The first transmission was made soon after troops from the U.S. and six Caribbean countries went into Grenada. The Prime Ministers from Barbados and St. Lucia and Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick spoke from USIA studios. They then answered questions from journalists gathered in American Embassies in five European capitals. Excerpts were shown that evening on TV news programs in all five countries.

Euronet permits live transmission of Presidential press conferences and speeches, press briefings from the State Department and the Foreign Press Centers, as well as the instantaneous delivery of USIA films, the TV Satellite File, and other material.

Next year, through an agreement with NASA and the Departments of State and Defense, the Agency hopes to be able to broadcast via a NASA satellite to dish antennas placed on most American Embassies in western Europe. This will permit longer direct transmissions and obviate the use of local land lines. Judging from the experience thus far, Euronet promises to be a flexible and poweful communications tool.

USIA is entering a new and creative television era. The Commission commends the Agency for the leadership, initiative, and enthusiastic innovation demonstrated in its use of this medium.

Project democracy

Project Democracy was a major multiagency programming initiative designed to advocate the principles of democracy abroad and support people and organizations committed to the development of democratic institutions. Its origins lie in President Reagan's Westminster speech to the British Parliament on June 8, 1982 when he promised the United States would engage in significant new effort to:

". . . foster the infrastructure of democracy—the system of a free press, unions, political parties, universities—which allows a people to choose their own way, to develop their own culture, to reconcile their own differences through peaceful means."

Project Democracy was presented to the Congress on February 23, 1983 by Secretary of State George Shultz. Its principal components include: (1) leadership training in the skills of democracy, (2) educational exchanges to increase mutual understanding, (3) programs to strengthen the institutions of democracy, (4) meetings and publications to convey ideas and information, and (5) development of institutional and personal ties between groups here and abroad.

Separately, but with Administration encouragement through an AID study grant, an alternative approach to the objective of strenghtening democratic values and institutions abroad was presented to the Congress by the bipartisan American Political Foundation. This initiative, labeled "The Democracy Program," recommended that Congress create a private, independent nonprofit corporation to be called the National Endowment for Democracy.[12] The Endowment would not administer programs but would provide funds to private sector groups. As originally conceived, principal recipients of Endowment funding would be institutes created by the Republican and Democratic parties, the AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union Institute, and the Chamber of Commerce's Center for International Private Enterprise.

The Commission supports the objectives of Democracy and the National Endowment for Democracy. A renewed commitment by the U.S. Government and American private sector organizations to the goal of encouraging democratic values and institutions abroad is very much in the national interest.

At the same time, the commission is troubled by elements of both approaches.

Considerable confusion and misunderstanding characterized efforts to explain Project Democracy. It was not effectively communicated to the Congress or to the American people. The name itself suggests a new mandate for USIA, when most of what was intended was enhancement of proven Agency information and educational and cultural exchange programs. It is a disservice to place Agency programs under a label that gives rise to public suspicion and misunderstanding—a label that also provide critical foreign observers with the opportunity to make damaging interpretations of the programs themselves.

The Commission has no intrinsic objections to USIA's undertaking new initiatives so long as they are in keeping with the Agency's statutory authorities. USIA should do so cautiously, however, taking care to keep appropriate Congressional committees fully informed.

The National Endowment for Democracy was approved by Congress in November, 1983.[13] Congress appropriated $18 million in USIA's FY 1984 budget for the Endowment. The Endowment's goals, as we understand them, are unobjectionable. Moreover, the Commission believes strongly that the pluralism of American society provides scope for initiative, motivation, innovation, and communication that adds appreciably to what can be accomplished through government programs alone. It may be that a new quasi-public organization with its own separate staff can help to develop a stronger partnership between government and private organizations in long-term democratic institution-building.

It should be remembered, however, that USIA and AID have for more than a generation worked successfully with academic institutions, private foundations, trade unions, civic organizations and professional associations. The relationship has achieved public objectives without undercutting private initiative and professional independence. And in those programs where academic integrity is essential—such as the Fulbright scholarship program—USIA has maintained multiple grant relationships with private organizations while preserving immunity to short-term fluctuations in U.S. foreign policy.

The Commission believes that Congress in time should look carefully at this legislation to determine whether most if not all of the Endowment's activities could be accomplished through grants made directly to private organizations by existing agencies of government. If another organizational filter for the purpose of channeling appropriated funds to private groups does not on full examination prove to be unnecessary, the Commission believes the Congress should take care to ensure that the Endowment's activities complement existing government programs and promote the long-term interests of the United States. For its part, the Commission too will carefully assess the activities of the Endowment in keeping with its legislative history and the Commission's USIA oversight responsibilities.[14]

Research: Recommendation

The Commission recommends that the staff and budget of the Office of Research be increased substantially to provide the research capability required for national security and foreign policy needs and for the regular and methodical evaluation of Agency programs and products.

The Director of USIA is required by Executive Order to provide the President, the National Security Council, and the Secretary of State with "assessments of the impact of actual and proposed United States foreign policy decisions on public opinion abroad."[15] To the extent that its limited resources permit, the Agency's Office of Research does conduct surveys and analyses of foreign public reaction to current U.S. policies. It also studies the perceptions and attitudes of influential groups toward the U.S.

These studies have been widely used and praised by the White House, the NSC, and the Departments of State and Defense. To date, however, they have focused mainly on assessing public reaction in Western Europe and Japan to existing U.S. security policies and on the problems of implementing them. To our knowledge, USIA has rarely been a participant in those councils or interdepartmental groups where new policies or options are developed. Nor has it been asked to assess the impact of proposed foreign policy decisions as called for by the Executive Order.

In the Commission's view, the Agency's research capability is a highly valuable, if underutilized, resource which can provide insights into foreign attitudes that should be an integral part of both executive and Congressional foreign policy deliberations.

Recently a new interagency group, the Foreign Opinion Research Advisory committee (FORA), was approved by the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs. It was established to coordinate and commission quantitative and qualitative studies of foreign opinion in support of the public diplomacy initiatives undertaken by the NSC's International Information Committee,[16] with emphasis on engendering foreign public support for U.S. policies. FORA is composed of representatives of USIA, the Departments of State and Defense and USAID. It is chaired by an officer from the NSC.

This is an encouraging, although thus far modest, development. FORA has no budget and a staff of only one officer. If supported and used, however, it should prove useful in identifying common information needs of the various U.S. Government agencies dealing with foreign affairs. It could also achieve better dissemination and use of research data, and involvement of the various agencies in the research process. It could produce some savings through elimination of duplicate research efforts and through resource-sharing. And it could help to institutionalize the central role of USIA's opinion research in the foreign policy process. The Commission will watch its activities and results with interest.

In its last two reports, this Commission observed that staff and funding levels for research were inadequate and should be substantially increased. The NSC has indicated that it agrees. Meeting with this Commission, senior NSC officers expressed their belief that resources for research should be approximately doubled. Research did receive a modest increase in FY 1983 (approximately $130,000), and we were pleased to note that FY 1984 appropriations included $4.1 million for research, an increase of $991,000 over the previous year. This is encouraging, but it will still not provide the research capability the Commission believes is required.

The Commission also recommended the Office of Research play a more active and systematic role in evaluating the effectiveness of Agency products and programs, including VOA. We recognized that this would require additional funding and personnel. The Office of Research does, of course, conduct occasional surveys of VOA listeners in various foreign countries to determine audience size and preferences. It also has made studies of communication/media habits in a few key countries. These are of considerable value to USIS posts in their planning, and should be done more frequently and include every priority country. But these modest efforts fall considerably short of the comprehensive approach to program evaluation that USIA needs.

We understand that the Office of Research plans—contingent upon the availability of funds—to reestablish a separate media research staff to carry out research for new VOA listener out-reach initiatives, to study the impact and effectiveness of the exchange programs, and to begin the systematic evaluation of Agency media products. Such evaluation and impact studies would be invaluable to Agency program planners and resource managers. We commend these new plans. We hope the Agency will accord them a high priority and that Congress will appropriate the necessary funds. A substantially increased research budget would serve the national interest.

Exhibits: Recommendation

The Commission recommends that USIA strengthen American cultural and political presence through an expanded exhibits program in Western Europe and the Third World.

I believe that the Commission can, consistent with its charter, contribute usefully to the oversight of the Endowment and its relationship with USIA. The Commission's role would be advisory and in the exercise of its oversight would have no authority or operational responsibilities with respect to the Endowment. However, I believe that Commission oversight will help to maintain the broad bipartisan support and national consensus that will be essential to success."* Congressional Record, November 17, 1983, pp. H 10331-2.

USIA's Exhibits Service produces an average of thirteen major exhibits a year. The Agency participates in international trade fairs and special international promotions, and it produces and distributes smaller displays in multiple copies for USIS posts. USIA is responsible, too, for official U.S. national exhibitions at International Expositions. For example, $8.5 million has been appropriated for U.S. participation at International Expo '85 to be held in Tsukuba, Japan.

The Commission finds the rationale for exhibits persuasive. Attendance at major exhibits ranges from the tens of thousands to occasional audiences of more than one million. A single Expo can draw as many as 20 million visitors. In the provincial cities of Eastern Europe and in the past, in the Soviet Union, exhibits with language-qualified American guides have provided many with their only first-hand exposure to the United States and to American citizens.

Following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, the United States stopped sending exhibitions and other cultural presentations to the Soviet Union. Recent efforts to negotiate a cultural agreement with the Soviet Union, which would include a major exhibit, have been sidetracked as a result of the shooting down of the Korean airliner. The Commission understands the logic of these decisions, but anticipates the day when Soviet attitudes will permit resumption of more normal cultural relations. The U.S. has much to gain from the exposure to American life that major exhibits can bring to the Soviet people.

The Commission is also persuaded there is much to be gained by mounting exhibits in Western and developing countries. For example, the recent success of USIA's American theater exhibit in Athens, at a time when sensitive base negotiations were taking place, demonstrated to members of the Commission that exhibits can make a powerful political and cultural statement in non-Communist countries where the U.S. has vital interests. The Commission recommends that USIA strengthen American cultural and political presence through an expanded exhibits program in Western Europe and the Third World.

EDUCATIONAL AND CULTURAL PROGRAMS

Exchanges and international visitors

This Commission has long regarded USIA's educational exchange and international visitors programs to be among the most effective tools of public diplomacy. They serve the long-term security interests of the United States by promoting mutual understanding between Americans and the citizens of other countries and by exposing foreign scholars and leaders to American institutions and values. In our last report we expressed our concern over the steady decline in resources allotted to these programs, and we recommended that they be materially strengthened.

We are pleased to note this decline has been reversed. The Pell Amendment to USIA's FY 1983 authorization legislation, for example, sought to double, through annual increases, the size of the FY 1982 budget for exchanges by FY 1986. Director Wick has declared his wholehearted support for this amendment. For FY 1984, Congress has appropriated $92.9 million for the Fulbright program, the Hubert H. Humphrey North-South Fellowship program, Congressional-German Bundestag sponsored youth exchanges, and the International Visitors program—an increase of $15.7 million over the FY 1983 figure. Congress has authorized even higher funding levels for FY 1985.

The decrease in the number of educational exchanges and international visitors was also a matter of concern to the Commission. From a high point of 904 Americans studying abroad on Fulbright grants in 1966-67, the number fell to 364 by 1980-81. The number rose to 395 in 1981-82 and stayed about the same in 1982-83. With the new budget, however, the number of American Fulbright scholars is expected to be well over 500. Foreign and private sector contributions to the Fulbright program last year—more than $100 million—were substantially greater than government-provided funds.

The International Visitors (IV) program, which brings young foreign leaders to the U.S. for visits of a few weeks, has followed a similar pattern. The number of IV grantees in 1978 was 2,171. Allotted funds did not keep up with inflation or rising costs, however, and by 1981 that number had fallen to 1,579. In response to appeals from ambassadors and USIS posts overseas, funds were increased; 1,732 young leaders visited this country in FY 1982, and 1,974 grantees came in FY 1983. The FY 1984 appropriation will result in a further increase in a program that this Commission, and many ambassadors with whom we have talked, believe is one of the most effective foreign affairs efforts conducted by the U.S. Government.

The Hubert H. Humphrey North-South Fellowship program awarded 125 grants in FY 1983 to mid-career professionals in public service from developing countries for one year of non-degree study and practical courses. An increase of $560,000 over the FY 1982 budget of $3.2 million will permit an expansion of this program.

The FY 1984 authorization provided that $2.5 million be used to fund a new youth exchange program jointly sponsored by the Congress and the German Bundestag as part of the President's International Youth Exchange Initiative.

Indicating the Agency's dedication to these programs and its desire to improve them, the Director has created an advisory panel on International Educational Exchange. Composed of 12 prominent educators, foundation executives and other private sector representatives, the panel was formed to "suggest means of strengthening exchange programs vital to the national interest."

At an early meeting of the panel, Director Wick explained his view of the importance and purpose of exchanges:

"This commitment to exchange programs demonstrates a broad-based understanding that they serve a vital national interest. We simply cannot do without the link that they provide us to significant levels of the thinking leadership of the world. The Fulbright program is not a national luxury. It is a national imperative that must be attended to."

The panel is expected to make a preliminary report early in 1984.

Press and Congressional criticism of a few controversial grants made by the Agency's Office of Private Sector Programs has provoked fears that the educational exchange programs might in turn be "politicized" and their scholarly integrity impaired.[17] The Commission has discussed these concerns with a number of Agency officials. Individual Commissioners have talked with chairmen of binational Fulbright commissions abroad as well as USIS Cultural Affairs Officers. We have also talked with members and staff of the Board of Foreign Scholarships, whose mandate is to monitor the administration of the academic exchange programs, and with representatives of non-governmental organizations in the U.S. engaged in carrying out USIA's exchange programs. Throughout our inquiries, we found no reason to doubt that the scholarly integrity and nonpolitical character of the peer review process by which the educational exchange grants are awarded is being respected and maintained.

USIA's FY 1984 authorization bill included for the first time a charter for the Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs analogous to the VOA Charter. According to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee report, the purpose of the charter is "to insure that the scholarly integrity, the excellence and the non-political character of these programs are maintained." The Committee added that "The effectiveness of these programs can be seriously undermined if they are perceived as a short-term exercise in promoting a particular viewpoint."

It was, we suspect, the controversy over the private sector grants that moved Congress to legislate a charter for the Bureau. There were even some suggestions that the Bureau should be transferred from USIA back to the Department of State, to another government agency, or to a private foundation.

The Commission does not question the idea of a charter for educational and cultural affairs. We are disturbed, however, by the suggestion that USIA should be reorganized again when it has only recently adjusted to the thoroughgoing reorganization of 1977. Furthermore, we see no reason for such a change.

The exchange programs are operating well. They are expanding, and we have found no evidence that their integrity has been in any way impaired or compromised. The Agency accords a high priority to the exchange programs and is committed to safeguarding and strenghthening them.

Finally, it was awkward in the past and would be again to have the exchange programs directed in Washington by one agency and carried out overseas by officers of another agency. We would point out that wherever these programs are located in Washington, they will continue to be administered overseas by career USIA foreign service officers. They will continue to be looked at in terms of their overall contribution to the long-term foreign policy goals of the United States. And the U.S. share of the programs will continue to come largely from appropriated funds.

The Commission is convinced that the proper place for the educational exchange programs is where they are right now—within USIA.

University affiliations

In 1983, USIA began the first year of the worldwide University Affiliation Program, following initial pilot linkage projects in specific geographic areas. This program seeks to bring closer ties between U.S. and foreign colleges and universities through exchanges of faculty for as short a period as three weeks and as long as a year.

Grants of $50,000 or less were awarded to 29 university partnerships and will be spent over the next two to three years. These faculty exchanges focus on the social sciences, humanities, communications and education. The institutions receiving grants in 1983 ranged from community colleges to Ivy League schools and included state colleges and universities throughout the United States.

USIS posts in countries where university affiliations exist are enthusiastic about them and hope to see the program expanded. The Commission views this as a logical extension of existing academic exchange programs and a commendable new initiative.

Private sector programs: Recommendations

The Commission recommends that Congress not extend the requirement that it be notified fifteen days in advance of all USIA program grants.

The Commission recommends that USIA seek and encourage promising new organizations to participate in its grants programs. Effective, traditionally-funded organizations, subject to careful scrutiny and periodic review, should continue to play a central role in multiplying what can be accomplished through government programs.

USIA 's Office of Private Sector Programs provides selective assistance and limited grant support to non-profit activities of private sector organizations whose goals complement the public diplomacy programs of the U.S. Government. The Office has an operating budget of approximately $7.1 million.

During the past year the Office has been the focus of considerable press attention and Congressional scrutiny. Allegations of political bias, flawed management, questionable grant decisions, and even illegality have characterized an intense public debate that unquestionably has affected the ability of the Office to contribute to the Agency's overall mission.

The Commission and USIA Inspectors have examined these allegations with care. We are aware of no illegalities in the operations of the Office, and we are satisfied that a number of steps have been taken to assure critics of the soundness and integrity of these valuable programs.

A thorough examination by USIA's Office of Inspections also identified no illegalities but did make a number of useful recommendations that have since been implemented by the Director of the Agency. Chief among these is the development of adequate guidelines and standards for the conduct of the grant process and the independent evaluation of grant applications. These guidelines have been submitted to the Commission and appropriate Committees of Congress. The Agency has also adopted personnel polices that will ensure continuity, staff expertise, and adequate management supervision in the Office.

In the Commission's judgment, these steps have done a great deal to re-establish public confidence in USIA's grant programs.

The Commission also welcomes continued Congressional oversight. It questions, however, whether the requirement that Congress be notified fifteen days in advance of all Agency program grants is necessary or sound public policy.

We strongly support the right of Congress to inquire into any aspect of USIA's activities including specific grant decisions. And USIA's Congressional oversight committees appropriately worked with the Agency to develop new grant application guidelines and grant review criteria. But it does not appear to be appropriate or useful for Congress to participate routinely in decisions to award Agency grants—in effect reserving the right to influence grant decisions before they are made. Moreover, to require that all program grants be submitted in advance creates an excessive administrative burden on the Agency. We urge Congress to reconsider its notification requirement.

Foundations, academic and cultural institutions, and other not-for-profit organizations are essential to the conduct of public diplomacy. Proven organizations, traditionally funded by USIA, should continue to play a central role in multiplying what can be accomplished through government programs alone. They should not, however, be immune to careful scrutiny and periodic review. At the same time, promising new organizations should be encouraged to participate in the Agency's grant programs. By acting as a catalyst to the involvement of both new and traditionally-funded organizations, the Office of Private Sector Programs performs an important and necessary function.

German-American Tricentennial

USIA has been deeply involved during the year in two related and significant efforts to strengthen U.S. ties with a key NATO ally, the Federal Republic of Germany.

The best known is the German-American Tricentennial, which commemorates the arrival of the first German immigrants to America in 1683 when 13 Mennonite families from the city of Krefeld, West Germany, arrived in Philadelphia and founded Germantown. The Tricentennial celebrates the contribution that citizens of German descent have made to the building of the United States. The Tricentennial was officially launched on January 6, 1983 when the Chairman of this Commission represented the U.S. Government and the American people at the inaugural ceremonies in Krefeld.

To encourage and coordinate the many activities and observances that took place during the year, and to raise money from private sector contributions to support them, President Reagan established a commission with members drawn from the government, the private sector and the German-American community. The USIA Director served on the Tricentennial Commission as the personal representative of the President. USIA provided staff and administrative support. More than 900 programs in 45 states and the District of Columbia have honored the Tricentennial. These have included symphony concerts, film festivals, book fairs and art exhibits.

Both countries have given this anniversary high-level attention. Vice President Bush traveled to Krefeld to take part with President Karl Carstens and Chancellor Helmut Kohl in a ceremony honoring the departure of the first German families. The high point of the year's cultural activities and ceremonies was the visit to Philadelphia in October of President Carstens and the dedication the same month of a two-acre Friendship Garden on the mall between the White House and the Jefferson Memorial.

Another initiative is the Inter-Agency Steering Committee on U.S.-German Contacts. At the request of the Secretary of State, Director Wick became chairman of the committee on which 25 federal departments and agencies—all with programs involving the Federal Republic of Germany—are represented. They range in size from the Department of Defense to the National Endowments for the Arts and Humanities. The Federal Republic has created a counterpart committee in Bonn. These committees are working to improve the quality of contacts between the two governments as well as to broaden and strengthen private exchanges.

The Commission regards the German-American Tricentennial as an especially interesting example of private sector-government cooperation, and commends the contribution of the Agency to these important efforts. USIA would do well, we think, to make continued use of shared interest in important historical events as a basis for significant program initiatives.

The President's International Youth Exchange Initiative.

President Reagan's International Youth Exchange Initiative was launched in May, 1982 at the Versailles conference with the enthusiastic approval of all summit partners. In the President's words, it will "insure closer relations and mutual understanding among the 'successor' generations" by increasing exchanges of young people, ages 15 to 25, between the United States and its economic summit partners—Canada, Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy, Japan and the United Kingdom. These countries are matching the money that the U.S. is spending on youth exchanges.

The Youth Exchange Initative is a partnership between the private sector and government to double the number of exchanges within three years. This partnership involves private organizations, who as grant recipients will actually manage the exchange program; private sector financial support raised by the President's Council; a privately funded advertising campaign; and increased community involvement.

The Initiative will not create new private or public organizations. Rather, it will help existing non-profit organizations expand and improve their programs by offering grants of combined donated and appropriated funds. In the first year, grants were awarded to 33 organizations, ranging from $8,000 to more than $590,000 and totaling about $1.4 million.

The President's Council for International Youth Exchange is composed of 110 American leaders in business and education, including Mrs. Mae Sue Talley, a member of this Commission. The Council seeks to raise $10 million over the next three years to match an equal amount from the federal government. During its first year, the Council has received pledges of $3.35 million.

The National Advertising Council has taken the International Youth Exchange as one of its public service ad campaigns. Youth Exchange ads are now appearing on television and radio and in newspapers and magazines across the country. The Ad Council estimates that 30 to 50 million dollars of free advertising will result. These ads recruit American host families and American youth for exchanges abroad.

USIA has always depended heavily on private citizens to carry out its mission. Director Charles Z. Wick has stated that one of his goals is to encourage a stronger partnership between USIA and the private sector in achieving shared goals in public diplomacy. The extensive involvement of the private sector in Youth Exchange—from families to large corporations to local communities—is a major step in that direction which should be encouraged.

A new program of this magnitude and complexity will undoubtedly encounter some problems. We understand that the intention is eventually to broaden this program to include developing countries as well. In the Commission's view this should be done as soon as feasible. Youth Exchange shows promise of becoming a major and permanent U.S. exchange program. The Commission commends the President's International Youth Exchange Initiative and will follow its development with great interest.

Books, libraries, and English teaching: Recommendations

The Commission recommends that Congress enact legislation increasing the tax deduction for donated books to increase the incentive for publishers to donate books for USIA program use.

The Commission recommends that the Agency strengthen its English teaching programs and give increased support to Binational Centers.

Books

USIA's book program promotes the export and distribution of American books in English and in translation abroad. Overseas, Agency-supported book publishing is primarily in such languages as Arabic, French, Spanish, and Chinese, with occasional publishing in other languages such as Korean, Thai, Burmese, and Portuguese.

USIA maintains regional book offices in Mexico City, Buenos Aires, Cairo, Hong Kong, and Paris for the African Regional Service Center. None of the books produced are actually published by USIA. Instead, its support takes the form of assistance to publishers who then sell the books through commercial channels.

In 1976, the number of books published with USIA's assistance dropped below one million for the first time since the program was established in 1950. USIA's book production in FY 1982 totalled only 571,035. Worldwide production in the 1960s was more than 10 million in some years.

By comparison, in 1980 (the latest year for which statistics are available), the Soviet Union published more than 12 million books in Spanish alone. In 1979 and 1980, the USSR's publishing of Spanish language children's books exceeded the total worldwide USIA efforts in all languages.

USIA's Donated Book program distributes books donated by U.S. publishers. These books are used for presentation to influential foreign nationals; to support Fulbright lecturers or other Americans speaking overseas; and for distribution or exhibition at libraries, seminars or scholarly institutions. For many years, donated books have been an important resources in USIA's cultural programs.

Until 1968, American publishers were able to deduct the "fair market value," i.e. approximately the retail price for books donated to USIA. But under an IRS ruling and subsequent tax legislation, publishers were limited to deductions for the "actual manufacturing cost" for such donations. It became cheaper for publishers to destroy their excess inventories than to pay shipping costs to USIA. Either way the tax advantage would be the same. Since 1969 donations to the Agency from American publishers have decreased from as many as 3 million books per year to approximately 100,000 per year.

The Commission recommends that Congress enact legislation increasing the tax deduction for donated books to double the manufacturing cost. This would provide an incentive for publishers to donate books to USIA and, in the Commission's view, avoid the abuses that led to more restrictive tax legislation. The Agency should of course retain its discretion to select only books that have program value. The Commission believes this would be an important step in promoting the dissemination of American books overseas.

The creation of an organization in the United States similar to the British Book Development Council should also be considered. The Council, sponsored by the British Government and the publishing industry, views books as an important expression of culture. It has proved exceptionally useful in encouraging book distribution overseas. It could serve as a model for U.S. Government and private sector cooperation.

Libraries

In the past twenty years the number of USIA libraries abroad dropped from 254 to 131, and the number of books in those libraries declined from 2.4 million to 800,000. Despite that, libraries continue to play a vital role in the Agency's cross-cultural communication effort.

USIA's libraries vary from country to country, but the majority offer a full range of library services—book loans, reference services (in person and by telephone and mail) and access to audio-visual materials. The collections in each library may range in size from 4,000 to 30,000 volumes. They focus on current publications in the social sciences, international relations, the arts, and the humanities. All maintain a core collection containing the high-lights and classics of American thought and literature. They provide foreign students and researchers access to the best of American scholarly and cultural achievement and are visited by more than 3.5 million people annually.

In 1982, the Agency issued a new policy statement for its libraries. It emphasized their value, calling them "visible American institutions . . . [which] provide an important and accessible American cultural presence overseas . . . well suited to reach influential leaders and the highly motivated self-selecting audience." The Commission concurs and hopes that USIA's libraries will receive the support they need to strengthen and expand their valuable work.

English Teaching and Binational Centers

Declining funds have also seriously weakened two other important and closely related programs—English teaching and Binational Centers (BNCs).

USIA supports both direct and indirect English teaching programs. The latter focuses on teacher training curricula development, and working with ministries of education and institutes of higher learning. In 1967 there were 107 USIA staff officers and 49 American grantees engaged in English teaching programs overseas. Today, the Agency has only 9 English teaching officers serving as consultants to USIS posts. The Agency prepares English teaching and teacher training materials, and also publishes the quarterly journal English Teaching Forum for teachers of English as a foreign language.

The Agency directly supports English teaching through BNCs, local binational institutions of private citizens which are largely self-supporting. In the opinion of many Agency officers, they are potentially one of the most important—and presently most neglected—resources for reaching successor generations in the developing countries. They are especially important in Latin America. Through their classes and libraries, BNCs teach English to large numbers of young people. More than 350,000 attended English-language classes at USIA-assisted centers last year. Some will reach positions of leadership having made a personal commitment to learn our language and culture. The proficiency in English acquired at the BNCs enables many of these students to seek admission to American universities and to compete for our exchange grants.

These centers, through their libraries and cultural programs, represent a continuing American interest in the daily life of the host country, reinforcing the awareness that local citizens and Americans share basic interests and can work together to mutual advantage. Yet despite their proven value to U.S. interests, years of budget constraints and higher priorities in other areas have led to a steady reduction in the Agency's involvement with BNCs. In 1968, for example, 139 American USIA personnel were serving in 132 BNCs around the world. Today, there are 13 Agency officers serving in 12 centers. The Agency does maintain some contact with approximately 60 centers around the world, offering occasional cultural programs and modest assistance.

Enhancement of the BNCs by USIA may take forms which do not necessarily mean a return to direct subsidies. USIA should look carefully at other options which would allow it to offer professional in-service training for English teachers and librarians, support in the form of texts and teaching aids, occasional upgrading of physical facilities of classrooms and libraries, and more frequent cultural programs.

MANAGEMENT

The agency changes names (plus que ça change . . .)

The United States Information Agency (USIA), known from 1978 to 1982 as the U.S. International Communication Agency (USICA), was officially renamed USIA on August 24, 1982 by act of Congress. Thus the Agency reverted to the name it had been known by since 1953, and overseas it is once again called the United States Information Service (USIS).

The name "USICA" led to confusion about the nature and purpose of the Agency and was never popular either with the Agency's employees or with the public abroad. The legislation leaves the Agency and its functions intact. The Commission commends the Agency Director for his initiative and the Congress for its action in bringing about a name change that everyone welcomed.

Relocation and consolidation of USIA in Washington

For 30 years USIA was plagued by the fact that its personnel and major activities in Washington were scattered in many widely dispersed locations in Washington. Inevitably, this made communications and coordination more difficult, and the efficiency of the Agency suffered. In the fall of 1981 the Agency began planning to rectify this situation and achieve a long-standing goal to consolidate its Washington headquarters.

A search team selected a new building at 301 4th Street, S.W., across the intersection from the Voice of America, and Congressional approval to lease the building was obtained in September 1982. The design of some 330,000 square feet of interior space was promptly completed, and the move began before the end of the year. By September 1983 the new USIA building was almost fully occupied, and more than 90 percent of the Agency's headquarters employees are now consolidated in three adjacent buildings. Although some regrets were expressed that the new location moved the Agency even further away from the State Department and the NSC, the consolidation has increased the efficiency of most Agency operations and improved space utilization.

It is also expected that there will be substantial savings. One-time expenses for the move were approximately $6.5 million, but over a ten-year period it has been estimated that there will be savings of between $7 and $9 million over and above the cost of the move.[18]

The Commission commends the Agency for its initiative in bringing about this long-sought relocation and consolidation and for the efficiency and swiftness with which the move was carried out.

Need for more personnel and posts overseas

In its earlier reports, this Commission expressed its conviction that public diplomacy is indispensable to our national security but that it has been inadequately understood and inadequately supported. USIA has never been given resources commensurate with its mission and responsibilities. As columnist James Reston commented recently, "Congress is so preoccupied with the war of missiles, tanks and planes that might happen in the future that it tends to forget the importance of the war of words that is now going on."[19]

The steady decline in the Agency's resources over the past fifteen years should be a matter of serious concern to Congress and the nation. Measured in constant dollars, USIA's budget has declined 27 percent since 1967, and its personnel level has dropped 34 percent. Even more disturbing to the Commission is the drop in the number of USIA employees overseas—where the work of explaining U.S. actions and supporting U.S. policies takes place. In 1967 the Agency had 1,716 Americans overseas and 7,062 foreign national employees. In 1983 there were only 941 Americans (a decline of 45 percent) and 3,539 foreign nationals (a decline of almost 50 percent).

Understaffing makes it difficult to administer a sound personnel assignment and transfer system. It also adversely affects professional development. For example, USIA's staffing level is too low to permit adequate specialized educational and training programs for junior and middle-grade officers.

The expansion of certain existing activities and the addition of major new programs will further strain the limits of already overburdened overseas staffs. The President's new International Youth Exchange Initiative and the increases in educational exchanges and the International Visitors program, mandated by the Pell Amendment, will require the support of additional American exchange officers and more foreign national employees if these important programs are to succeed.

The investigations of this Commission, including inspection trips by individual Commission members to a substantial number of overseas posts in every geographic area, have pointed up the pressing need for more people and more posts. For example, China, the world's most populous nation, presents unique opportunities and challenges to USIA as it emerges from 30 years of isolation. The Chinese are eager to know about the U.S. and its policies. USIS can perform a vital function here, as it has demonstrated by the achievements of posts in Beijing, Shanghia and Guangzhou (Canton).

It is essential that we now reach other parts of China. The Agency should open branch posts in Shenyang (Manchuria), in Chengdu (Sichuan), concurrent with the opening of the new American Consulate General in that city this year, and in Wuhan (Central China), where another American Consulate General is soon to be opened. These cities are the administrative, commercial and educational centers for regions having a combined population of more than 350 million people. U.S. interests would also be well-served if there were branch posts in Khon Kaen, Thailand and in Yogyakarta, Indonesia.

Dwindling resources caused the Agency to close many small posts, some of which the Commission believes should be reopened. For the last ten years USIS has had no American officers in any city outside of London or Paris in the United Kingdom and France. We believe there is important work for USIS officers in the major regional centers in those countries. Branch posts are also needed in Spain, Portugal, Germany, Morocco and Nigeria. American officers should be assigned to Mozambique and Djibouti. The Agency recently expanded its eastern Caribbean operations to include Grenada. Beyond that in Latin America, the need is for more people and resources for existing posts.

We do not wish to list every post and position where additional personnel are needed, but we do wish to make the point that the Agency's overseas staffing has been reduced below the level where new programs can be accommodated or critical issues adequately handled. While the Agency proposes to add a few new positions and post overseas, it should assign a much higher priority to the strengthening of its operations in the field.

Personnel and management problems

During the spring of 1983, the Commission became concerned when a number of newspaper stories alleged nepotism, favoritism and other personnel irregularities in USIA. We were also informed of Congressional inquiries on the same subject.

The Commission held closed hearings during which it met with the Director, the Agency's Counselor, the Chief Inspector and other senior Agency officials. We learned that the Director had been out of the country when the press articles appeared and the first Congressional inquiries were made. Upon his return, the Director acted promptly: he notified the Comptroller General of the allegations and also ordered investigations by the Agency's Inspection Office, USIA's Office of Security, and the General Counsel.

The investigations found instances of procedural irregularities and bad judgment, but nothing of an illegal or fraudulent nature. Congressional inquiries were answered fully and forth-rightly. The Director subsequently established a new position of Inspector General, the number of auditors was increased, and an Assistant Director of Management for Policy Coordination was named as an addition to the Director's staff. More recently, a new Deputy Director and a new Associate Director for Management were nominated.

The Commission was concerned that managerial inadequacies, lax review procedures and critical press coverage could erode public confidence in the Agency. We are persuaded, however, that when the Director confronted the allegations and irregularities, he took action to report, investigate, and correct them. The Commission will monitor the new management arrangements and procedures.

Senior Foreign Service assignments

For years, this Commission has observed with concern the scant consideration accorded Senior Foreign Service Officers from USIA for assignment abroad as ambassadors or deputy chiefs of mission (DCM).

USIA's officers constitute approximately 19 percent of the career Foreign Service. They enter through the same competitive process (the same examinations administered by the Foreign Service Board of Examiners), are promoted by the same criteria, and share similar experiences and responsibilities abroad with their Foreign Service colleagues from State. In fact, most senior USIA public affairs officers have had far greater experience managing sizeable staffs and substantial budgets than their State Department colleagues of equal rank. Nonetheless, it is rare for a USIA Senior Foreign Service Officer to be appointed ambassador or DCM.[20]

Based on many visits to posts abroad, we are convinced that this does not reflect on the quality of USIA's officers. Rather, it suggests the absence of a process by which they can be fairly evaluated in comparison with their State Department colleagues for these senior positions.

The legislative history of the establishment of the USIA career service and the Senior Foreign Service clearly reveals the presumption that USIA officers would serve in senior positions of our overseas missions. As early as 1966, the Deputy Undersecretary of State for Administration, William J. Crockett, testifying before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said: "Bringing USIA officers into the career Foreign Service will increase the number of men and women with broad professional training in foreign affairs from whom the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, can choose outstanding individuals for posts of high responsibility."[21]

The Foreign Service Act of 1980 instructed the Secretary of State and the Director of USIA to "implement policies and procedures to insure the Foreign Service officers of the United States Information Agency are able to compete for chief of mission positions and have opportunities for assignments outside their area of specialization on the same basis as other Foreign Service officers." Unfortunately, this portion of the Foreign Service Act has largely been ignored.

The record will show that USIA officers serve with distinction in U.S. missions through the level of Public Affairs Counselor. There they find themselves blocked with little chance to compete for DCM and ambassadorial appointments. Inevitably, this has become a serious morale problem for senior Agency officers. An opportunity to be seriously considered for DCM and ambassadorial appointments would benefit the officers and the entire service.

In an attempt to correct this situation, Congress in 1983 passed legislation changing the designation of USIA's Foreign Service Information Officers to Foreign Service Officers. The name change helps remove implications of second-class status. Congressional intent is clearly to give USIA officers the same opportunities as State Department officers to compete for senior Foreign Service assignments.[22]

There is an increasing need for ambassadors with public affairs skills. Modern developments in communication and transportation have significantly altered the role and functions of ambassadors, greatly increasing the importance of public diplomacy in the conduct of international affairs. As a result, the experience of USIA's senior officers has become even more relevant to our country's needs abroad.

We realize that years of habit and tradition cannot abruptly be changed. Nevertheless, a way should be found by State and USIA to assign the best of USIA's career officers as chiefs or deputy chiefs of mission.

APPENDIX I

Radio Marti

On September 22, 1981, President Reagan issued Executive Order 12323 creating a Presidential Commission on Broadcasting to Cuba. A ten-member Commission, chaired by F. Clifton White, was appointed in mid-January, 1982.[23]

In its Final Report, the Commission urged the early establishment of radio broadcasting to provide the people of Cuba with accurate news and information, particularly about Cuba itself. The Commission recommended that broadcasting to Cuba be undertaken by an independent, non-profit entity, called Radio Broadcasting to Cuba, Inc., which would operate in much the same manner as Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty.

At the same time, President Reagan sought legislation to authorize and appropriate funds for radio broadcasting to Cuba. The Administration proposed a separate government-funded station named Radio Marti and sought to place it under the Board for International Broadcasting.

Congress approved Radio Marti in the fall of 1983, but in a very different form. Rather than a separate station, it placed Radio Marti within the Voice of America, providing for 14 hours of daily VOA programming directed at Cuba. It also established a Presidential Advisory Board for Radio Broadcasting to Cuba.

The U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy met to consider the impact of this legislation. Historically, this Commission has not questioned separately funded surrogate broadcasting activities. It has, however, strongly opposed placing them in the Voice of America.

The Commission decided to reaffirm its position publicly in letters to the President and his senior foreign affairs advisors and to Congressional leaders involved in the Radio Marti decision. We have reprinted the Commission's letter and several replies to it, because we believe they are helpful in clarifying Congressional and Administration intent in implementing the Radio Marti legislation.

As requested by the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, and in connection with its general oversight responsibilities, this Commission will assess the activities and organizational structure of Radio Marti with care.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 26, 1984]

BEYOND WICKGATE

Newshounds pawing through Charles Wick's closet recently may be missing the real story coming from the U.S. Information Agency. A USIA advisory commission, led this year by the Heritage Foundation's Edwin Feulner, has just finished a report that could radically alter the way U.S. foreign policy is shaped. Issued last week, the Feulner report is a battle plan for the war of ideas—a war worth more vigorous pursuit.

In essence, the report recommends that politicians give USIA more clout and less lip. That means, first, more resources. Congress last year approved tiny parts of a five-year plan to refurbish the broadcast facilities of Voice of America and Radio Free Europe, some of which date to Harry Truman. Still, the Feulner Report says, USIA's budget has declined 27% in real terms since 1967. Total payroll dropped 34% in the same span, more drastically overseas. Then, USIA employed 7,000 foreign nationals; now, 3,500.

While the report doesn't say so, USIA also needs more-serious efforts from the State Department to negotiate for new facilities overseas and to overcome jamming by the Soviets and Cubans, now said to cost $300 million annually. Last year, U.S. diplomats reviewing human rights agreed in Madrid to omit mention of jamming as a vital denial of freedom.

The most important recommendation may be this: Use USIA for input as well as output. For example, the commission suggests that the head of USIA serve as an adviser to the National Security Council, as the heads of the CIA and Joint Chiefs do now. Congress recommended this step in 1977, but the needed executive order was never issued. The commission also would expand USIA's ability to sample foreign opinion through polls, news surveys and other means.

These steps would focus needed attention on popular forces in the world, one of the keys to a successful American foreign policy. Even enthusiasts often see public diplomacy as a useful but separate device, boxed off from the "real" foreign policy of treaties and summitry. Instead, we should be integrating the global electorate into our decisions—what Jeff Bell has described on these pages as a "populist foreign policy." Whether we are promoting economic growth models in Latin America or a consensus for action in the alliance, the success of U.S. dilomacy is likely to hinge on the support of foreign people.

When President Reagan decided to restrict U.S. participation in Europe's Soviet pipeline fiasco, for example, the notion was widely accepted that this had "angered our allies." In fact, the decision did outrage many political and business elites. But it excited many Britons to ask why Margret Thatcher wasn't following America's lead, and led to German magazine reports on slave labor used to build the pipeline. Polish marchers shouted, "Death to Brezhnev, Long Live Ronald Reagan,"

A sophisticated policy would take note of such effects before deciding that sanctions against the Soviets are "unpopular with our allies." The Feulner report shares this insight and makes some sensible suggestions for the USIA that would help broaden foreign-policy creation.

CHARLESTON NAVAL SHIPYARD RECEIPT OF CHIEF OF NAVAL MATERIAL PRODUCTIVITY EXCELLENCE AWARD

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the Charleston Naval Shipyard in the beautiful port city of Charleston, S.C., has been selected to receive the prestigious Chief of Naval Material Productivity Excellence Award.

The shipyard competed in diverse areas such as cost savings, productivity improvement, and overhauls completed within cost. The Charleston Naval Shipyard was in competition with other such shipyards around the country, and its selection for this award recognizes the outstanding work done by South Carolinians and the members of the U.S. Navy who work at the shipyard.

In the words of the shipyard commander:

This is the premier award and means that we have been recognized as the number one shipyard by two higher echelons of command.

The shipyard commander, Capt. R. G. Camacho, Mr. Jack Day, director of management engineering and a Clemson University graduate, and the men and women who work at the Charleston Naval Shipyard are to be commended for their fine dedication in service to our country.

Mr. President, it is only proper that the Senate recognize the dedication and achievements of these fine Americans.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

The message also annouced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2898) to declare certain lands to be held in trust for the benefit of the Paiute Indian Tribe of Utah, and for other purposes.

At 2:58 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the bill (S. 1186) to clear certain impediments to the licensing of the yacht Dad's Pad for employment in the coastwise trade, with an amendment, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bills, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 440. An act for the relief of Fredrick Francisco Akers;

H.R. 1557. An act for the relief of William D. Benomi;

COMPUTER CRIME PREVENTION ACT OF 1984

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Computer Crime Prevention Act of 1984 to protect personal, business, and government information from the threat of computer-related crime. I am pleased that Senators LEVIN and RUDMAN are joining me today in introducing this bill.

As we all know, computers have become, in their relatively short history, indispensable to the workings of our society and have revolutionized the way the world collects, stores, transfers, and uses information. Computers have touched almost every aspect of our daily lives and have become valuable tools of business, medicine, government, academia, defense, and countless other fields. Indeed, if you suddenly took away all of our mainframes, remote terminals, and home computers, the world would function at a much slower pace.

Despite the great benefits of computers, however, we are finding more and more that computers can be the Achilles heel of business and government. Information can easily be stolen, altered, or destroyed by persons who gain unauthorized access to computers. Such trespasses against business or government computers can cost stockholders and taxpayers dearly. Moreover, when computers are invaded, the personal privacy of millions of Americans whose records are stored in the computers could be jeopardized.

Last October, the Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management, which I chair, held 2 days of hearings on the issue of computer crime and security. The subcommittee received testimony from many experts from both the Federal Government and the private sector on the threats that are posed by computer break-ins and on what steps can be taken to address these problems.

Those hearings vividly illustrated that computer break-ins should not be treated as simply innocent pranks by curious youngsters. Rather, computer abuse can seriously harm personal lives and businesses. The subcommittee heard testimony from a member of a group of computer hackers who had broken into the computers of credit bureaus and had changed the credit ratings of prominent persons. While the hackers considered this activity to be simply joyriding, serious injury could have occurred to the reputations of the individuals whose records were involved. Similarly, unauthorized access to medical records could result in injury or death if patient information were altered. The subcommittee learned that there is potentially big money at stake in computer crime, as persons can access computers to commit fraud or to obtain confidential business, investment, or government information.

The accounts of computer break-ins are legion, and evidence suggests that the reported cases represent only a small percentage of the actual number of break-ins that have occurred.

The hearings also revealed that Federal law has not kept pace with the problem of computer crime and does not adequately deter these activities. The Department of Justice testified, for example, that there is currently no Federal sanction dealing specifically with computer crime. Any enforcement action in response to computer-related crime must rely on statutory restrictions that were designed for other offenses, such as the mail or wire fraud statutes. Enforcement officers and Federal prosecutors are thus required to create a theory of prosecution that fits the "square peg of computer crime into the round hole of theft, embezzlement, or even illegal conversion of trade secrets." This can often result in the dismissal of cases because existing statutes cannot be stretched far enough to cover the computer crimes involved.

While many private companies and some Federal agencies are combating computer crime through enhanced security measures, there is strong support among the business community for Federal computer crime legislation. In a recent survey of members of the American Society of Industrial Security, for example, 93 percent of those responding indicated that a Federal computer crime statute is necessary to deter and more effectively prosecute computer abusers.

In order to correct these problems, I am introducing the Computer Crime Prevention Act of 1984. First, this bill would make it a violation of Federal law to use a computer covered by the act to devise a scheme to defraud, or to embezzle, steal, or knowingly convert the property of another to his own use or to the use of another. This provision would cover, for example, persons engaging in industrial espionage. The bill provides penalties of up to $50,000 or three times the amount of the gain from this prohibited activity, whichever is higher, or up to 5 years imprisonment, or both.

The bill establishes the same penalties for any person who intentionally and without authorization damages a Federal or financial institution's computer, or deletes or alters data stored in these systems. Finally, the bill provides the same penalties for any person who intentionally and without authorization buys, procures, or sells the password or access code of a computer covered by the act.

The bill provides lesser penalties for persons who knowingly, intentionally, and without authorization access a computer covered by the act. These activities are subject to fines of up to $5,000, imprisonment of up to 1 year, or both. This provision is designed to protect the privacy and confidentiality of personal and business records from trespassers who peruse or copy the information. It would cover the intentional hacker; however, because this provision covers only knowing, intentional trespasses, it will not penalize computer enthusiasts who accidentally tap into the computer systems.

The bill covers three types of computers which are highly vulnerable to computer crime. First, all computers owned or operated by the Federal Government are protected by the act. The Federal Government now has over 18,000 medium and large-scale computers at some 4,500 sites. In addition, the GSA estimates that the Federal Government could have between 250,000 and 500,000 micros in place by 1990. Many of these computers contain valuable national security and financial information, as well as personal and proprietary data of millions of individuals and businesses.

Second, the bill covers the computers of federally guaranteed financial institutions. The widespread use of electronic funds transfers and computerized banking practices have made these computers particularly vulnerable to abuse. Finally, this bill covers all networks operating in interstate commerce.

This bill has been carefully drafted to insure that the jurisdiction of State law enforcement officials is not preempted by the mere existence of a Federal computer crime law. Rather, the bill sets forth elements that Federal law enforcement officers should consider in deciding whether to exercise Federal jurisdiction in a computer crime case.

I want to point out that this bill is not intended to act as a substitute for strong computer security measures in the Federal Government or private sector. Government and business would be, in my opinion, negligent if they leave their computer systems wide open to abuse. Especially in the Federal agencies, stronger computer security policies should be adopted and followed. Federal computer crime legislation is a crucial step, however, in deterring and facilitating the prosecution of computer crime and abuse.

Mr. President, in this Orwellian year of 1984, we are very conscious of the dangers to personal privacy that exist in our computer age. Computer crime legislation is one concrete way in which the Government can act to protect the privacy and integrity of personal and business information. I urge my colleagues to support this bill and ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2270

"(4) Except as otherwise prohibited by law, information or material obtained pursuant to the exercise of Federal jurisdiction may be made available to State or local law enforcement officers having concurrent jurisdiction, and to State or local authorities otherwise assigned responsibility with regard to the conduct constituting the offense.

"(5) An issue relating to the propriety of the exercise of or of the failure to exercise Federal jurisdiction over an offense as described in this section, or otherwise relating to the compliance, or to the failure to comply, with this section, may not be litigated, and a court may not entertain or resolve such an issue except as may be necessary in the course of granting leave to file a dismissal of an indictment, an information, or a complaint.".

S. 2271. A bill to authorize the transfer to the Smithsonian Institution without reimbursement of the General Post Office Building and the site thereof located in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

TRANSFER OF GENERAL POST OFFICE BUILDING TO THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, today I am introducing, along with Senator GARN and Senator SASSER, a bill to authorize the transfer of the General Post Office Building located between Seventh and Eights Streets, Northwest, and E and F Streets, Northwest, to the Smithsonian Institution. The building is presently being used by the International Trade Commission and the U.S. Postal Service, and it is our understanding that the ITC desires to move to more modern and appropriate offices.

The Smithsonian Institution has plans to use the General Post Office Building for special and changing art exhibits sponsored by the National Portrait Gallery and the National Museum of American Art. Library facilities, and auditorium and other research facilities would also be located in the building. In addition, the General Post Office Building would house the Archives of American Art. According to the development plans, the building would be integrated with the Old Patent Office Building, home of the National Portrait Gallery and National Museum of American Art.

The Board of Regents of the Smithsonian has approved the proposal to acquire the General Post Office Building for the Institution.●

S. 2272. A bill to authorize the Smithsonian Institution to plan and construct facilities for certain science activities of the Institution, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

CONSTRUCTION OF SCIENCE FACILITIES

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the Air and Space Museum is moving forward with a wide range of new programs, the most important of which is the proposed new facility at Dulles. The National Air and Space Museum has amply demonstrated its ability to preserve for posterity the inspiring achievements of America in the field of air and space by becoming not only the most popular museum in the world, but the most popular museum in history.

Yet, science marches on and contemporary airplanes such as the 747, Air Force One, and the Concorde, and the space shuttle Enterprise, are too large to bring, even disassembled, to the Mall. They must be introduced to the museum for the inspiration of our children and grandchildren at an airfield site.

Dulles Airport is the logical site for the construction of the great new museum which, like the museum on the Mall, will become a standard for the world. We would be remiss not to encourage the establishment of this facility at Dulles which will not only showcase the technological marvels of the present and the future, but also serve as a sensible economic alternative to replacing the buildings at the existing Silver Hill site. The museum will have the opportunity to exhibit these wonderful artifacts in totally new ways and at the same time make available to the public, insight into the outstanding craftsmanship that goes into the restoration of these airplanes and space vehicles.●

STUDENT AID VOLUNTEER EARNINGS ACT

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce legislation to create a student aid volunteer earnings program. This program is designed to address two very real problems. Today, higher education and postsecondary vocational training costs more than ever, while loans and jobs to help young adults defray expenses are scarcer than ever. At the same time, State and local governments have been squeezed by the combination of recession and Federal cutbacks, and many of the needs of our communities and our people are simply not being met.

Fifty years ago, Franklin Delano Roosevelt launched the most successful civilian youth program in the history of our country. In 9 years, the Civilian Conservation Corps put 3 million young people to work carving out roads and trails, stretching phone lines, and building bridges. After World War II Harry Truman helped millions of young American veterans get a higher education through the GI bill.

Twenty years ago, John F. Kennedy captured the imagination of a new generation of Americans when he launched the Peace Corps, and that program lives on today. And despite what the cynics may say, so does the idea of young people serving their society. The State of California, for example, now runs its own Youth Conservation Corps, and attracts thousands of young recruits each year, promising only hard work, miserable conditions, and low pay.

So if young people today seem disillusioned or disenchanted, it may simply be because we have been too tentative to inspire them and too timid to ask them to serve their country.

Under the SAVE program, young volunteers will perform community service work in libraries, daycare centers, schools, parks, or with senior citizens. They may serve for a maximum of 2 years and will be paid the minimum wage. In addition, they will receive Federal assistance for college or vocational training upon completing the program. Besides meeting a number of immediate national needs, I believe this program constitutes a sound, long-term investment in America's future.

The work performed under the SAVE program will not be make-work. Organizations which apply for funds to sponsor volunteers will be required to explicitly define the work they will perform. In addition, the organizations will be required to pay 20 percent of the volunteers' wages. This will insure that they have a stake in creating meaningful opportunities and in monitoring work habits and attendance.

In short, the SAVE program will provide communities with a corps of motivated young people to enhance the effectiveness of local human services and environmental concerns, and it will provide young people with employment opportunities and financial resources which will allow them to pursue higher education and vocational training.●

S. 2274. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to authorize a service pension of $150 per month for veterans of World War I and for certain surviving spouses of such veterans; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

WORLD WAR I VETERANS' SERVICE PENSION ACT

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today which will authorize a service pension of $150 per month for veterans of World War I and for certain surviving spouses of such veterans. A similar bill, H.R. 1918, is pending in the House where over 200 of our colleagues from that body have cosponsored it.

Those who valiantly served our country during World War I in order to preserve the principles of freedom should not be forgotten. Veterans of World War I are few in number and deserving of this small monthly pension. It is appropriate to demonstrate our concern and compassion for these veterans while we still have the time to do so.

Under this legislation, title 38 of the United States Code would be amended to extend benefits of $150 per month to veterans of World War I and certain surviving spouses. The measure will clearly take into consideration the availability of appropriations in paying these benefits.

The VA Administrator will make these payments to any World War I veteran who served in the active military, naval, or air service for 90 days or more during World War I, was discharged or released from such service for a service-connected disability, or served for a period of 90 consecutive days or more which began or ended during World War I.

Those who served during World War I, did so under very adverse and unfavorable circumstances and deserve every benefit possible. In this respect, our praise should go beyond the mere recognition of their deeds but should also extend to include this proposed benefit. We should not only extend our appreciation and compassion in words, but also in deeds.

Mr. President, I am introducing this legislation as a firm believer in those individuals who courageously gave of themselves in World War I. There are only 297,000 World War I veterans and 210,000 spouses still surviving. I am convinced this cause is worthwhile to honor those who fought for our freedoms during World War I.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the passage of this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2275. A bill to establish a program to improve the leadership and management skills of school administrators, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

LEADERSHIP IN EDUCATIONAL ADMINISTRATION DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1984

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, elementary and secondary school administrators must play a central role in improving the level of instruction and achievement in American schools. Today I am introducing legislation to enhance the leadership and managerial skills of those who have taken on this responsibility which is so critical to our Nation's future.

"Leadership" is a term we have heard repeatedly during the school improvement debate. In setting a new course for American education, leadership here in Washington and from State and local governments is vitally important. But leadership must begin in the schools themselves. We need leaders—those who unify and motivate both faculty and students—in every school building in the country.

Although studies on American education do not identify any single ingredient for success in improving schools, they do indicate that our most effective schools are those characterized by strong leadership by the school principal. The principal sets a school's instructional objectives, strengthens the commitment of teachers, evaluates school achievements and takes corrective action when they fall short.

Management abilities are closely linked with personal leadership qualities in the school principal. The ways in which a principal allocates time and resources, evaluates staff, administers the budget and handles paperwork contribute significantly to his or her success at improving the schoolwide learning environment.

The leadership skills of principals and other school administrators are being tested now as never before. We look to school administrators to insure that the drive for educational improvement will not falter. The Leadership in Educational Administration Development Act of 1984 establishes a program to help equip administrators for this challenge by enhancing their managerial, evaluation, communication, budgetary, and human relations skills.

This legislation will enable institutions of higher education to compete for Federal grants to create regional technical assistance centers for the development of the leadership abilities fo elementary and secondary school administrators. One center would be established in each Federal region, affiliated with a local college or university and drawing on established expertise in the fields of education and business administration. In addition to these regional centers, some funds would be set aside for the establishment of metropolitan training centers by local school districts, State education agencies, or private management organizations.

These training centers will conduct workshops emphasizing the unique combination of educational and managerial skills which are required for effective school administration. The programs will train administrators to set educational goals and strategies to attain them; to master objective techniques for evaluating teachers performance; to assess the effectiveness of the school curriculum; to improve the quality of instruction through analysis and classroom observation; to improve the administrative abilities necessary for effective school leadership—communications, consensus-building, time-management, budgetary, disciplinary and other skills.

Administrators already at work as well as those newly entering this challenging field will be served by the centers. Programs will feature instructors from both the academic and business communities and will also offer training by practicing administrators with proven records in outstanding school districts. The centers will collect and disseminate information about leadership skills associated with successful schools, and offer internships for participants in business, industry and established effective schools.

This legislation is designed to provide seed money to establish these centers as permanent laboratories for training and research in effective school leadership. The competitive nature of the program will insure that the best proposals are funded. Those submitting proposals must obtain 50 percent matching funds and demonstrate a commitment to continue operating the program after federal funds expire. Once their effectiveness has been demonstrated, these centers will hopefully succeed in generating sufficient support from public and private sources to provide ongoing programs for school administrators.

The importance of administrative leadership in schools has been stressed in several major studies of our problems in education in the past year. School leadership was emphasized in the report of the task force on education for economic growth of the Education Commission of the States, which reported:

In study after study, it has been shown that one key determinant of excellence in public schooling is the leadership of the individual school principal. In those schools where the principal is well-trained, highly motivated and zealously devoted to inspiring excellence among teachers and students, the effect is bracing—even in ghetto schools whose facilities are inadequate and whose students come from poor families . . .

Specifically, we urge that each state examine and improve its programs for training school principals and aspiring principals, and that effective new programs be established to train principals in effective educational management . . .

We recommend that school systems expand and improve, at every level of administration, their use of effective management techniques. Business can help here, with exchange programs and other collaborative efforts to train school managers and to keep school officials abreast of the latest techniques in fiscal and personnel management . . .

Good administrative leadership is a key to good schools. The bill I am introducing today can help to improve the climate for learning in American schools without greatly expanding the federal role or unduly interfering with local prerogatives. By offering this type of training initiative, I believe we can bolster that key ingredient of leadership.

Companion legislation is being introduced in the House by Representatives PETRI and GOODLING. The bill provides a sound opportunity for Congress to renew its commitment to improving the quality of education in the United States. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Leadership in Educational Administration Development Act of 1984 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

By Mr. TRIBLE (for himself and Mr. WARNER):

S. 2276. A bill to direct the Secretary of Transportation to study the feasibility of constructing a rail rapid transit line between the West Falls Church, Va. station of the Washington, D.C. Metrorail System and Dulles International Airport; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

RAIL ALTERNATIVES FOR TRANSPORTATION TO AND FROM DULLES INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, solving tomorrow's transportation problems requires that we anticipate them and begin seeking solutions today.

For this reason, Senator WARNER and I are introducing legislation which would direct the Transportation Department to study the feasibility of a rail link between Dulles Airport and the Metrorail System. Congressman FRANK WOLF is introducing a companion measure in the House of Representatives.

Several factors have led to our conclusion that rail service must be carefully studied.

First and foremost, we must find inexpensive and innovative methods to encourage use of Dulles Airport. The location of Dulles Airport is the main obstacle to greater use of the facility. Only those who drive can reach it in a timely manner. A rail link between Dulles and Metrorail would make Dulles accessible to anyone who can conveniently travel to a Metro Station.

As Dulles expands, local and Federal planners must also contend with congested roads in the vicinity of the airport. The Dulles access road and the parallel toll lanes now under construction will reduce congestion for the time being. However, western Fairfax County—the area around Tysons Corner, Reston, Herndon, and the Route 50 corridor has seen rapid growth during the past decade and will remain a growth area for the remainder of this century. A rail link which Reston and Herndon commuters could use to connect with Metro would prevent additional congestion on the over-taxed roads in this burgeoning area.

This rail link should produce more riders for Metro, reduce operating deficits, protect our environment and save energy, since it will reduce the number of cars on the road.

One transportation consultant estimates that a light rail system could be constructed for 20 percent of the cost of Metro. This is the type of alternative which we must examine as we seek to restrain Federal expenditures. Furthermore, this study should examine the feasibility of State, local, and private sector participation.

Rail service to Dulles may or may not be cost-effective. We will only know this when we study the proposal carefully. It is better to conduct such a study today, anticipating tomorrow's transportation problems, than to desperately search for "quick fix" solutions when those problems beset us in the coming decades.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Virginia in introducing this legislation to begin a study of different rail alternatives in order to improve ground transportation to and from Dulles Airport.

One of the major long-range transportation goals I have had as a U.S. Senator is a major shift in jet airliner traffic from the federally owned and operated Washington National Airport to the federally owned and operated Dulles International Airport. One of the major stumbling blocks to this effort has been the lack of convenience to Dulles caused by inadequate accessibility and ground transportation. We have been moving to correct this problem and the introduction of this legislation is another positive step toward solving what most northern Virginians consider to be the region's No. 1 problem—transportation. That is transportation to and from work, that is access to the world's air transportation system, that is a safe and reliable public transit system.

The recent opening of the Dulles access road-I-66 connector road represents a major improvement in access to Dulles Airport. By using I-66, the connector, and the Dulles access road, a driver can cut 20 to 30 minutes off the trip to and from Dulles. The next step is to tie Dulles in with Washington's mass transportation system, and the purpose of this legislation is to begin a study on how we can best accomplish this.

This project's timeliness is important as we are attempting to expand the terminal facilities at Dulles in order to handle the new passenger traffic we expect at Dulles in the next several years.

So, Mr. President, this project is an important element in the overall package we are trying to put together that will result in Dulles Airport becoming the major airport for the metropolitan Washington, D.C., area.

By Mr. METZENBAUM (for himself, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. RIEGLE):

S. 2277. A bill to prevent certain acquisitions of domestic petroleum companies by major international energy concerns; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DOMESTIC PETROLEUM COMPANY ACQUISITION ACT OF 1984

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the recent announcement of the proposed Texaco-Getty merger signals a new wave of oil company acquisitions. Indeed, the Wall Street Journal recently reported that the major oil companies, encouraged by Texaco's bold bid for Getty, are eyeing new takeover targets, including Superior Oil, Sun Oil, Union Oil, and Occidental Oil.

If the Texaco-Getty merger is approved, it may well lead to far greater concentration in this vital industry. Eventually, a handful of companies could control our energy destiny.

I am not the only one with this concern. In fact, leading industry figures have expressed a similar fear.

J. Hugh Liedtke, chairman of Pennzoil Corp., recently said:

> If the Getty-Texaco merger were to be permitted under the antitrust laws, then I think you're going to see a tremendous upheaval in the industry which would entail the few very large companies gobbling up all of the medium-sized and smaller companies . . . pretty soon you're only going to have half a dozen of them and you will have true monopoly.

I believe that these efforts by major oil companies to acquire their midsize competitors is directly contrary to the national interest.

First, they will reduce competition in the oil industry, both at the producing and retailing level.

Second, they will accelerate the shutdown of independent service station dealers, concentrating greater market power in the hands of the major oil companies.

Third, they will focus the search for new oil supplies on Wall Street, rather than on new energy frontiers, inevitably reducing new oil and gas discoveries. Our energy security would be endangered.

In order to preserve competition and promote energy independence, I am introducing today legislation that would prohibit mergers between major oil companies and midsize oil companies, unless such mergers demonstrably increase oil and gas development and production.

The inescapable fact about the Texaco-Getty merger is that it will encourage similar oil company takeovers. Experts believe that other midsized concerns with major family shareholders, such as Superior Oil, will be prime targets in the coming months. Investment advisers are urging clients to buy stocks in publicly held concerns such as Union Oil and Phillips Petroleum so that profits can be taken when anticipated takeover maneuvers begin.

These deals will have nothing to do with efficiency or creating new energy supplies. Rather, they involve a redirection of capital to acquire proven reserves rather than toward more risky ventures to discover new reserves.

If these acquisitions go forward, as is likely, the result will be further concentration of the energy industry. Our antitrust policy has always been sensitive to the need to arrest trends toward concentration so we can prevent monopolies before they begin. This legislation is consistent with this historic national policy.

In addition to promoting horizontal concentration, these mergers will harm competition through increased vertical control of retail outlets by the major integrated companies. Texaco, for example, has actively pursued a strategy of shutting down its independent service station owners in favor of company-owned outlets. If the majors continue to acquire midsized companies, this disturbing trend will accelerate.

As independent retail outlets are eliminated, the major oil companies will be able to more effectively dictate the retail price of gasoline. Experience indicates that this will result in higher pump prices. In addition, independent service station dealers often provide consumers with a full-service option often unavailable at company-owned outlets. Independent service station dealers are also a major competitive force in the automotive repair market. As the majors drive the independents out of business, the availability of such service will be reduced, consumer choices narrowed, and prices will increase.

Pennzoil's Liedtke described what will happen if these mergers continue:

> In our business, in the future, the big reserves of oil and gas are going to be found in frontier areas, at a great depth principally, and probably through tertiary recovery. When I say this, I'm talking about areas like the Bering Sea, I'm talking about offshore Alaska, I'm talking about the overthrust belt in the Western United States, and there's another overthrust belt in the eastern part of the United States . . .
>
> These areas take enormous amounts of money to play (in), and if medium-sized companies are taken out of that play and can't bid in, then you're going to lose a lot of competition for finding new oil . . .

The brokerage firm of Shearson-American Express recently bluntly told investors why these oil mergers are occurring.

> Buyouts are attractive because they represent a compelling alternative to finding and developing oil from scratch.

A new wave of oil company mergers will also severely undermine our policy or energy independence. Billions of dollars will be spent to shuffle proven reserves among companies. As long as the industry giants can obtain new reserves by purchasing undervalued stock in other oil companies, they have no incentive to discover new reliable sources of energy.

If the major multinationals cannot acquire reserves through mergers, they will invest in developing new sources of oil and gas. The tax laws currently give the oil industry special deductions worth billions of dollars in order to encourage such development. Without this legislation, that money will be used merely to concentrate proven reserves in fewer hands and we will not see the new exploration which is necessary to lower energy costs and lessen our reliance on vulnerable foreign sources.

The measure introduced today will stop this merger craze, by prohibiting major oil companies from acquiring control of approximately 11 midsized domestic energy concerns. The bill will contain an exemption which would allow such mergers if the firms can prove that the transaction will cause new exploration or development of energy resources.

I am pleased to have as cosponsors of the important legislation my distinguished colleagues, Senators RUDMAN, BINGAMAN, BUMPERS, LEVIN, PROXMIRE, and RIEGLE.●

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ:

S. 2278. A bill entitled the "Care for Chemically Dependent Veterans Act"; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

CARE FOR CHEMICALLY DEPENDENT VETERANS ACT

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that will make permanent the Veterans' Administration's authority to place chemically dependent veterans in non-VA community facilities.

Currently, this program is operating under a pilot authority that is due to expire September 30, 1985. The program was begun in 1979 in response to inadequacies in the VA's chemical-dependency program.

Mr. President, I have been in contact with VA officials in medical facilities around Minnesota concerning this program. And their response to my questions about how well it is working have been overwhelming. The typical comment has been: "It's the best thing ever to happen to the VA's chemical-dependency program." Veterans who have been through it have made the same sort of comment.

The VA, and the rest of us, have come a long way in our willingness to treat those who suffer from alcohol or drug dependencies. It was not so long ago that alcoholics were considered willful malingerers, and medical treatment consisted of drunk tanks only. Today, we recognize that chemical dependency is a disease, and should receive medical care accordingly.

I believe the VA's current halfway-house approach of treatment and rehabilitation should be encouraged and continued. And that is why I am introducing my bill today. I hope we on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs can address this issue this year, and remove any uncertainty about the program's future.●

S.J. Res. 228. Joint resolution to designate the week of May 20, 1984, through May 26, 1984, as "National Digestive Diseases Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary

NATIONAL DIGESTIVE DISEASES AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I am gratified to join with my friend and able colleague, Senator ANDREWS, in introducing a joint resolution of the Congress, designating the week of May 20 through May 26, 1984, as "National Digestive Diseases Awareness Week." Provided that this resolution meets with the approval of both bodies of the Congress and the President of the United States, it will mark the second year that such a proclamation has been made, calling upon all Government agencies and the people of the Nation to observe this week with appropriate programs and activities.

The digestive system, which includes the esophagus, stomach, intestines, gallbladder, liver, and pancreas, can be affected by a wide range of acute and chronic diseases. To one who suffers from a disorder of the digestive tract, the problems range from mild discomfort to an actual threat to life itself. It has been estimated that 20 million Americans suffer from chronic digestive diseases, with over 14 million cases of acute disorders treated yearly. Tragically, more than 200,000 deaths result from these illnesses each year.

We have introduced this resolution today because we feel that it is important to recognize the impact of digestive diseases on our Nation's health. More Americans are hospitalized with disorders of the digestive organs or the gastrointestinal tract than with any other group of disorders, accounting for 15 percent of all admissions to general hospitals. When measured in economic terms, digestive disorders are extremely costly to the American public—with direct personal health care expenditures for treatment estimated at over $17 billion per year. These direct health care payments combined with annual lost wages, taxes, and disability result in a total economic burden of approximately $50 billion annually.

While the monetary cost to our country resulting from digestive diseases is staggering, the cost is even greater when measured in terms of human discomfort and pain. Some of these debilitating diseases affecting Americans are quite common, such as ulcers and hepatitis. Others, such as inflammatory bowel diseases and pancreatitis, occur less frequently, but the effects may be just as devastating. Unfortunately, the occurrence of these last two illness is proportionately high in West Virginia. Gastrointestinal cancers are also quite common. On a nationwide basis, these malignancies account for approximately 30 percent of all deaths due to cancer. In West Virginia alone, an estimated 1,000 new cases of colon and rectal cancers, 200 new stomach cancers, and 250 new pancreatic cancers are anticipated to be diagnosed in 1984. In this same year, it is estimated that 475 West Virginians will die from cancer of the colon and rectum, 100 from cancer of the stomach, and 200 are expected to die from cancer of the pancreas.

In light of these grim facts, we feel it is imperative that the people of the United States be made to recognize disorders of the digestive system as a major health concern. Research into the causes, cures, prevention, and clinical treatment of digestive diseases and related nutrition problems should become a national health priority.

To date, we have made tremendous strides in the effort to combat these illnesses. A long-range plan to combat digestive disorders was developed by the National Commission on Digestive Diseases in 1979, and in 1980 the Congress established the National Digestive Disease Advisory Board to advise the Commission and the Secretary of HHS on how to implement the plan, and to monitor the efforts of Federal agencies and private organizations. As a result the national digestive disease education program was established to heighten awareness and to increase knowledge of these disorders, informing the public about the diagnosis, treatment, control, and prevention of such health problems.

With prime responsibility for research and research training in digestive diseases at the National Institutes of Health, the National Institute of Arthritis, Diabetes, and Digestive and Kidney Diseases has led our Nation's medical research community to such tremendous achievements as: First, the isolation of two viruses that cause infectious hepatitis, and the development of a vaccine to prevent type B hepatitis; second, accumulation of knowledge on the cause of gallstones for which nonsurgical treatments are now being developed and tested; third, vast improvements in the techniques for the diagnosis of digestive diseases—with fiberoptic endoscopes, the physician of today can actually look into much of the digestive tract, and in many cases can remove small tumors or polyps—believed to be forerunners of colon cancer—without surgery; fourth, development of ultrasound and CAT scanning for identification of disease of the pancreas, gallbladder, or the liver; fifth, accumulation of knowledge about the cause of scarring within the liver which leads to cirrhosis—now the sixth leading cause of death in the United States—this knowledge may provide a basis for new treatments; sixth, development of new drugs for the treatment of peptic ulcer disease, which have lowered the frequency of complications and the need for surgery; and seventh, improvement in the success rate of liver transplants due to improved operative techniques and management, and to the use of a new immunosuppressant, Cyclosporin A.

These are truly remarkable accomplishments about which our Nation's medical and biomedical research communities should be extremely proud. Through the cooperative efforts of those involved in research and the efforts of concerned Federal and State agencies, including the Digestive Diseases Clearinghouse, voluntary lay and medical organization, and through the coalition of digestive disease organizations, it is our hope that someday, in the not too far distant future, we can drastically reduce the occurrence and severity of digestive disorders, if not totally eliminate them. Our short-term goals addressed in this resolution are to mobilize and focus the activities of the digestive disease community to educate the public and health care community as to the seriousness of digestive diseases and to provide information relative to treatment, prevention and control.

● Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my fellow colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia, in introducing a joint resolution designating the week of May 20–26, 1984, as

"National Digestive Disease Awareness Week."

Presently, 20 million Americans endure the pain that results from chronic digestive disease disorders. Each year, we lose one-tenth of our population to digestive disease illnesses. These disorders range from cancer affecting the pancreas, colon, and other sections of the digestive tract to one of the most painful afflictions known as Crohn's disease which affects both the small and large intestines.

Despite these grim statistics, I am pleased to note that we have made tremendous progress in finding cures for the millions who suffer from these tragic ailments. Through the achievements of the National Institute of Arthritis, Diabetes, and Digestive and Kidney Diseases, we have found effective medications which help victims of Crohn's disease to live a full and active life.

I urge my colleagues to join with me and Senator RANDOLPH in supporting this legislation. Through passage of this resolution, we will recognize both the gravity of digestive diseases and the great strides which have been made in seeing that these victims can live life to the fullest.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 94—RELATING TO JEWISH EMIGRATION FROM SYRIA

Mr. MOYNIHAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 94

Whereas the Syrian Government has forbidden all members of the Syrian Jewish community to emigrate;

Whereas the approximately 4,500 Jews living in Syria have been victims of a systematic anti-Jewish, anti-Zionist program, which has included severed restrictions on travel abroad, loss of the right to hold government jobs, laws requiring that all Jews bear special identification cards, and restrictions on Jewish rights of inheritance;

Whereas recent events, including the unexplained murders of a young Syrian Jewish woman and her children, suggest a renewed pattern of violence against the Jews in Syria; and

Whereas Syrian President Hafez Assad stated in a 1976 interview that he would allow the members of the Syrian Jewish community to emigrate to the United States: Now, therefore, be it—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that the president of Syria should immediately permit all members of the Syrian Jewish community to emigrate from Syria to the United States.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today, close to 5,000 Syrian Jews are living in constant fear for their lives. On December 28, 1983, in the town of Aleppo, a Jewish mother, Lillian Adabi, and her two young children were brutally murdered and their bodies mutilated. In a nation ruled by terror, this appalling crime is not so much a matter for law enforcement officials as a message deliberately sent.

The atrocity at Aleppo is only the most recent outrage perpetrated against the Syrian Jewish community. They live in constant fear of harassment and assault, yet they cannot leave. Jews in Syria are forbidden to emigrate, a denial of a basic right recognized by civilized nations the world over and one enjoyed by all other groups in Syria. In March 1974, two Jewish men were murdered and four young Jewish women were raped and killed after attempting to flee Syria for Lebanon.

Also Jews are the object of official discrimination in Syria. Syrian law requires that all Jews carry special identification cards stamped "Musawi"—followers of Moses. No other community in Syria is so identified by religion. To travel abroad—if permitted at all—Jews must post bonds equivalent to $5,000 and leave members of their immediate family behind, like hostages, to guarantee their return. Syrian authorities cruelly have ignored appeals for family reunions with relatives in other nations.

The 25,000 Jews of Syrian origin live in the United States. Many members of this community have offered to provide homes to the Jews of Syria, should they ever be permitted to emigrate.

We have come to expect brutality from Syria's President Hafez Assad and from his brother Rifaat, the chief of Syria's internal security forces. We have watched this regime murder indiscriminately for decades. In recent months, Americans have experienced the ruthlessness of the Assads in Lebanon—at great cost of American life. Our own experiences with the current Syrian regime ought to make us especially sensitive to the fear and isolation of the Syrian Jewish community.

The awful killing of the Adabi family in Aleppo has added new urgency to the plight of Syrian Jews. The danger to them is real and present.

On January 31, 1984, I spoke at a "Community Wide Rally to Save Syrian Jewry" held by members of the Share Zion Congregation in Brooklyn, N.Y., to focus attention on the conditions facing Syrian Jews. The distinguished Governor of New York, my friend Mario M. Cuomo, issued a proclamation designating January 31, 1984, as "Save Syrian Jewry Day" in New York.

Mr. President, the Syrian Jewish community is one of the oldest Jewish communities on Earth. We cannot stand by silently as the Jews of Syria, who have suffered for so many years, are persecuted and murdered. I have introduced a concurrent resolution calling on the President of Syria immediately to permit all members of the Syrian Jewish community to emigrate from Syria. I invite my colleagues in the Senate to join me in support of this humanitarian appeal.

I ask unanimous consent that the Proclamation of the Governor of New York be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the proclamation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROCLAMATION

The Jews in Syria, numbering some 4,000 souls, have been living in constant fear, experiencing discrimination and deprived of their basic and elemental rights as citizens of their country.

They have been subjected to acts of violence and terrorism and denied the universally recognized right to emigrate.

A community-wide rally is being organized in support of their human rights on Tuesday, January 31, 1984.

Now, therefore, I, Mario M. Cuomo, Governor of the State of New York, do hereby proclaim January 31, 1984, as

SAVE SYRIAN JEWRY DAY

In New York State, and I join with the Syrian Jewish community of New York and with all citizens of New York State in requesting unrestricted emigration of Syrian Jews to countries of their choice and the protection of the security, safety and human rights of those Jews who choose to remain in Syria.

I appeal to President Hafez Assad of Syria to meet these humanitarian requests on behalf of Syrian Jews.●

On page 8, line 15, after the period insert the following: "Under this bill, the Government may not seek the death penalty in any proceeding brought against a juvenile pursuant to chapter 403 of this title."

AMENDMENT NO. 2702

MERIT PAY SYSTEM REFORM

PROXMIRE AMENDMENT NO. 2703

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. PROXMIRE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 958) to amend chapter 54 of title 5, United States Code, to reform the merit pay system; as follows:

At the appropriate place in the committee substitute, insert the following new section:

SEC. . (a) For the purposes of this section, "executive dining room" means any dining room which is located in an office building used by any agency in the executive branch and where breakfast, lunch, or dinner—

(1) is available only to an officer or employee of the Government serving in a position in the executive branch in grade GS-15 or above, Executive Level V or above, or colonel or above, or their guests; or

(2) was available only to such officers or employees or their guests before the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Each person receiving a meal in an executive dining room or a Senate dining facility shall be charged for such meal a price in an amount which is not less than an amount sufficient to defray the cost of providing such meal considering the cost of the food, labor, and utilities, and the depreciation of equipment used in providing such meal.

(c) Sums collected pursuant to subsection (c) shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

NO FREE LUNCH ACT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, when the President of the United States visited the Capitol for a January 24 luncheon, he set a sterling example for the rest of the Federal Government. He handed the distinguished majority leader, Mr. BAKER, a $5 bill to show that there is no such thing as a free lunch. That principle, enunciated so well by the President, should be applied to exclusive dining rooms operated by executive agencies but heavily subsidized by the taxpayer.

The President was right on the money when he pointed out that there really is no such thing as a free lunch. But Federal agencies operate 22 exclusive dining rooms which dish up the next best thing—meals which the taxpayer subsidizes to the tune of 82 cents out of every $1 spent.

In fiscal year 1981, the Federal Government spent about $2,900,000 to operate these dining rooms. Those privileged to use these restaurants—Government executives who normally earn over $55,000 a year—paid about $500,000 for their meals. The taxpayer, whose average salary is less than half that of those executives, forked over the remaining $2,400,000.

Mr. President, I can see no rationale for continuing this subsidy. It promotes inefficiency—why be concerned over cost when you know the taxpayer is going to be paying most of it. And it is simply unfair to the taxpayers of this country.

This amendment would end those subsidies. Those who eat in the executive dining rooms would be required to pay the cost of their meals. And just to be fair, the bill also applies to dining rooms operated by the Senate.

FEDERAL DEFICIT REDUCTION

HELMS (AND OTHERS AMENDMENT NO. 2704

(Ordered to lie on the table)

Mr. HELMS (for himself, Mr. MCCLURE, and Mr. NICKLES) submitted an amendment intended to be prosposed by them to a budget resolution; as follows:

At the appropriate place in the Budget Resolution, add the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this resolution the functional totals for all functions save social security and defense are reduced by 10 per centum."

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am today offering on behalf of the able Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE) and myself, an amendment that will effectively bring down the soaring Federal deficit. The amendment will be called up when the Budget Resolution is considered by the Senate.

Simply put, the proposal would reduce by 10 percent the cost of all functions of this year's concurrent budget resolution except social security, national defense, and interest on the Federal debt.

Using economic assumptions from the President's budget, with which I do not necessarily agree, the amendment would cut $27.7 billion from the deficit this year alone. I believe it will be much more than that.

Mr. President, I offered an identical amendment last May during the budget debate. Forty-one Senators supported it. Our purpose in offering this amendment today is to advise the appropriate committees of the Senate that we intend to have a vote on this proposition later in the year.

Mr. President, I am not one who subscribes to the view held by some that deficits can be tolerated, even in the short term. To do so is to ignore the role of debt servicing costs in the deficit picture. Historically, the Federal Government has paid as little as 1 or 2 percent annual interest on the debt. Now, because Federal policies have pushed interest rates to far higher levels, debt servicing costs are astronomical. In the fiscal year 1985 budget, interest payments on the debt amount to more than $116 billion. That is 12.5 percent of the total proposal expenditures—a level that is absolutely intolerable, in the short run or over the longer haul.

The cost of paying the interest on the Federal debt illustrates the urgency of eliminating the deficit. However, I agree with President Reagan's comment that the way in which we go about it is all important.

Mr. President, I do not believe tax increases of any kind should be used in a futile effort to bring down the deficit. Nor do I believe Congress should approve a compromise package of spending cuts and tax increases. Middle class Americans are paying more taxes now than they can stand. Many would agree that the Federal Government's hands are already too deep in their pockets.

We must think about cutting taxes, not raising them.

In weeks to come, I will be urging Senators to study other means of reducing the deficit, including the so-called grace commission report on fraud and waste in government, the prospects of giving the President line-item veto authority over all spending bills approved by Congress, and the need for basic reform of entitlement programs, which are now spiraling out of control. I also want to examine how many tax dollars could be saved by doing away with all nonmilitary foreign aid.

I encourage other Senators to examine this proposal and to join in this effort to cut Federal spending.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be held at the desk and that the text of it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE AVIAN INFLUENZA EPIDEMIC

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I would like to call attention to the plight of poultry farmers in Pennsylvania, and to address the threat facing the poultry industry nationwide. These farmers are suffering incredible losses to their flocks because of an epidemic of highly pathogenic avian influenza.

A mild form of this disease was first detected in Lancaster County in mid-April 1983, and has now become quite deadly. In early November, an extraordinary emergency was declared, and USDA began an eradication program. This program calls for the depopulation of infected birds, and pays farmers to rebuild their decimated flocks. Recently, USDA broadened the scope of the program to include the destruction of birds suffering from the mild strain of the virus, or low pathogenic avian influenza. To date, over 10 million chickens have been destroyed, while as many as an additional 10 million await destruction.

Currently, the indemnity program pays only the replacement value of the depopulated flocks, but more must be done to save these farmers. That is why I, along with 24 of my House and Senate colleagues from Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and New Jersey, sent a letter to the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, David Stockman. In this letter, we have urged Mr. Stockman to approve the release of funds necessary to reimburse poultry farmers for the fair market value of their flocks eradicated due to avian influenza.

I would like to stress that this is indeed a national problem and is deserving of a national remedy. By the time USDA completes the eradication process, Pennsylvania farmers will have lost nearly one-third of their flocks. Our farmers have made a tremendous sacrifice for the greater interest of maintaining healthy poultry flocks around the Nation. I believe they must receive just and due compensation for these staggering losses, and that the Federal Government has a responsibility to guarantee the future livelihoods of these farmers. We cannot allow our farmers' future to be trampled out of existence, and I will continue my work to insure the future viability of the poultry industry, both in my State and across the entire Nation.

I ask that the full text of our letter to Mr. Stockman be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., January 30, 1984.

MR. DAVID STOCKMAN,
Director, Office of Management and Budget, Executive Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. STOCKMAN: We are writing to urge your immediate approval of funds which will fairly compensate poultry farmers in Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, and New Jersey for the loss of millions of birds destroyed as a result of the avian influenza.

As you know, the first outbreak of this disease was discovered in Pennsylvania in mid-April. This first strain was relatively mild, but by late October, the virus changed and became highly fatal. Because the virulent form of the virus continued to spread, the USDA declared an extraordinary emergency in Pennsylvania on November 9, 1983. As a result of this announcement, the federal government implemented an eradication program that provides for the destruction of all infected birds with the high pathogenic virus and established an indemnity program that pays farmers for the repopulation of their flocks.

The USDA recently announced that the eradication of the low pathogenic virus will begin immediately in Pennsylvania and Virginia in order to totally eradicate the disease. The eradication program and subsequent indemnity program must meet the test of fairness and effectiveness by justly compensating farmers for their losses.

Under the existing indemnity program, farmers are now receiving the price of replacing their birds, but this figure doesn't begin to reflect the true extent of their losses. We are asking for fair and adequate compensation for our farmers—we are not seeking a windfall. The indemnity payments must reflect the fair market value of the chickens destroyed.

Precedent for paying fair market value and fairly compensating farmers was set during the eradication of the exotic Newcastle disease in California. Under this 1972 program, farmers were paid the initial sum, based on replacement value, plus a supplemental payment to reflect fair market value. It is only just that farmers subject to the eradication program be offered equal consideration. Without such payments, the poultry industry in affected states will have no future.

It must be emphasized that without fair compensation, as reflected in fair market value, the cooperative spirit shown by the poultry farmers will quickly deteriorate. The USDA will not be able to achieve the desired degree of cooperation in identifying other low pathogenic flocks unless the compensation is perceived as reasonable and fair. Without the farmers' full participation in this process, the problems and cost of eliminating this disease will dramatically increase.

This outbreak of avian influenza is a threat not only to the mid-Atlantic poultry industry, but to the poultry industry nationwide, and, therefore, deserves national attention and a national remedy.

These farmers have performed a heroic national service for the rest of the country in combating and containing the flu. They have allowed their flocks to be eradicated so that all other flocks21Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Sincerely,

Robert S. Walker, George W. Gekas, William F. Clinger, Jr., John Heinz, Arlen Specter, Joseph R. Biden, Jr., Frank Harrison, William F. Goodling, Thomas M. Foglietta, Richard T. Schulze, w Revolution in Nicaragua," is my former administrative assistant, Mr. Jim Guirard, Jr. Following a distinguished career of almost 20 years on Capitol Hill, Jim Guirard served for the year 1981 as national affairs director of the American Security Council Foundation and has been for the last 2 years a governmental affairs consultant here in Washington, D.C.

Jim Guirard's article lists by name 20 of the most prominent among these defectors from the earlier revolution—all of them opponents of Somoza and most of them so much so that they became high Government officials in the early months of the Sandinista regime. One by one, all of these people have either defected from or have been totally alienated by the increasingly repressive Marxist-Leninist regime which is now led by such confirmed Communists as the Ortega brothers and Tomas Borge.

He suggests that in the defection of the non-Communist leaders of the 1979 revolution, the "human rights legitimacy of the old revolution (now deceased) has been transferred to the New Revolution"—which, therefore, deserves our sympathy and support.

This rationale makes it all the more appropriate that the Congress has finally decided to continue this assistance, despite a recommendation by the House of Representatives that it be terminated.

Mr. President, I ask that Jim Guirard's article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Times, Nov. 15, 1983]

THE NEW REVOLUTION IN NICARAGUA

(By Jim Guirard Jr.)

Americans have long yearned to be on the "right side" of a truly popular revolution in Latin America—one in which the United States is not obligated, in the name of anti-communism, to prop up the repressive regime under attack. But now that there is just such a revolution in progress—the New Revolution in Nicaragua—the New York Times-Washington Post wing of the media is demanding that we oppose it and "finally accept" the old 1979 Sandinista Revolution instead.

The fatal flaw in this argument is that there is nothing left in the earlier revolution for an honest civil-libertarian to accept. It has devolved into nothing more than a grisly dictatorship of the Gestapo-left—a fact which is becoming so obvious as to begin causing doubts among even the most pro-Sandinista of journalists.

Between the lines, all but the very most pseudo-liberal of them seem increasingly haunted by an honorable impulse to hold their noses when trying to explain why it is "acceptable" to hold hands with such vicious illiberals—such fascists—as the Ortega brothers, Tomas Borge and Fidel Castro. But they still do recommend the old revolution over the new one.

Could it be that many of these journalists (like the House of Representatives, which has twice voted to prohibit U.S. aid to the New Revolution) fail to recognize:

The Sandinistas' total repudiation of the democratic goals which constituted their former legitimacy?

The Sandinistas' total subservience to the Cubans and the Soviets?

The pluralist, civil-libertarian sentiments of most of the New Revolution's political leaders—most of whom were leaders of the 1979 revolution as well?

Many lawmakers and journalists continue to hope naively that the Sandinista junta is merely "leftist," which falsely implies that it is liberal. Such people would do well to listen instead to what the Sandinistas say about themselves, to themselves, when they think Americans are not listening. Consider, for example, the following excerpt from a July 21, 1981 speech to fellow Sandinistas by Humberto Ortega, minister of defense and brother of Daniel Ortega, chief of the junta:

"We are not going to give ourselves a false name. Our revolution has a profoundly anti-imperialist, profoundly revolutionary, profoundly class nature. We are anti-Yankee, against the bourgeoisie . . . We guide ourselves by the scientific doctrine of revolution, by Marxism-Leninism . . . Without Sandinism we cannot be Marxist-Leninists, and Sandinism without Marxism-Leninism cannot be revolutionary . . . [so] we are making the effort to transform our society in a revolutionary way, not a reformist way."

Translation: Make no mistake about it, comrades. We believe in doing things the way Lenin did. We are dyed-in-the-wool communists, and we are going to stay that way.

Jose Esteban Gonzales, longtime enemy of Somoza and now exiled director of the Nicaragua Permanent Commission on Human Rights, explains what this means to the now "liberated" people of Nicaragua:

"During the first few days of the revolution we refused to make comparisons (between the new government and Somoza) because there was a different situation. Now I say clearly the situation is much worse. During the Somoza regime the repression didn't affect the whole community but only those who were in conflict with the government. But now everybody in Nicaragua is affected—not just those who are directly political."

Congressmen and journalists who applauded Gonzales when he condemned Somoza now seem deaf, dumb, and blind to his testimony that the Sandinistas are much worse. They condemn him and the whole "Contra" group of revolutionaries as "thugs, thieves, and brigands"—the words of Rep. Tom Downey (D-N.Y.). They talk of Nicaragua's admittedly communist dictatorship in such powder-puff terms as "non-pluralistic socialism"—the words of Washington Post reporter on Central America, Karen De Young.

In effect, the House and the press are listening still to the hollow echo of a "revolution" which has lost the right to be known by that honorable name. And they turn a deaf ear to the cries for help from those who desire the democracy and pluralism which gave that earlier revolution its legitimacy—its soul. Such people as:

Alfonso Robelo, a leader of the first revolution and member of the original Sandinista junta;

Eden Pastora, military hero of the first revolution and ex-deputy defense minister;

Arturo Cruz, ex-member of the junta and ex-Sandinista ambassador to the U.S.;

Jose Francisco Cardenal, former vice president of the Sandinistas' Council of State;

Edgard Macias, anti-Somoza militant and head of the Popular Social Christian Party;

Jose Esteban Gonzales, head of the Nicaraguan Permanent Commission on Human Rights;

Violeta Chamorro, ex-member of the original Sandinista junta;

Pedro Joaquin Chamorro, Jr., former Sandinista supporter—publisher (like his father before him) of La Prensa;

Humberto Belli, anti-Somoza editor of La Prensa;

Jaime Montealegre, ex-vice president of the Sandinista Council of State;

Agustin Alfaro, ex-Sandinista consul general in New Orleans;

Miguel Bolanos, ex-official of the Sandinista security police;

Adolfo Calero, head of Nicaraguan Conservative Party; jailed by Somoza; now head of the Contras;

Archbishop Obando y Bravo head of the Nicaraguan Catholic Church and former Sandinista supporter;

Carlos Coronel, ex-Sandinista minister of fisheries;

Alvaro Taboada, ex-Sandinista ambassador to Equador;

Francisco Fiallos, ex-Sandinista ambassador to Geneva;

Heraldo Montealegre, ex-Sandinista alternate governor of the World Bank;

Steadman Fagoth, leader of the Miskito Indians and former antisomocista.

The list goes on and on. Indeed, it grows each day as the Contras and allied groups gain recruits. The point is that in the defection of such leaders the "human rights" legitimacy of the old revolution (now deceased) has been transferred to the New Revolution—the "Nuevolucion," we should christen it.

If the revolution of 1979 merited "liberal" and "progressive" support, then the Nuevolution of 1983 merits it all the more. First, because the tyranny against which it is directed is more oppressive to Nicaraguans than was the Somoza regime. Second, because the Sandinista dictatorship is far more dangerous to neighboring peoples than Somoza ever was. Third, because so many of the same good people (absent the perfidious communists, of course) are leading this New Revolution as led the old one.●

COMMENDING CONGRESSMAN BARBER CONABLE

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to commend one of Congress most distinguished and respected Members, my good friend, Congressman BARBER CONABLE of Alexander, N.Y.

While many pass through the Halls of Congress, few manage to leave their mark on this institution. BARBER CONABLE is one of those few.

As the ranking minority member of the House Ways and Means Committee, widely believed to be the most powerful of all congressional committees, Congressman CONABLE has proved instrumental in helping get the Government off people's backs.

His work on the President's National Commission on Social Security Reform was widely admired by the Members of Congress he worked with, as well as by the other members of the Commission. This accomplishment is just one of many that can be attributed to the Congressman.

In addition, I would like to give credit to Mr. CONABLE for the yeoman work he has done on behalf of the Reagan Presidency. Mr. CONABLE has been one of the President's staunchest allies in the House of Representatives, consistently coming to the President's aid on crucial votes before the Ways and Means Committee and on the floor of the House. He was the chief minority sponsor of the 1981 Reagan tax cuts and shephered them through to passage. Many needed reforms would not have been enacted if it were not for the Congressman.

But even more than for these political accomplishments, BARBER CONABLE will be remembered by his political allies and foes alike as a warm and decent man. I have personally benefited from his unerringly wise counsel. I appreciate even more than that the warm hand of friendship he extended when I was still a stranger in this town. Washington will miss BARBER CONABLE and his tomahawk collection. Some treasures cannot be replaced.

New York and the Nation will be the less for the retirement of this distinguished Congressman. I hope that even though he is retiring from Congress, he will still remain in the service of President Reagan and the Nation. I can think of no one better qualified. In fact, it is my belief that the President ought to give serious consideration to naming Mr. CONABLE the next Secretary of the Treasury. I would fully support him if he chose to do so.●

ROBERT E. TRUMBULE

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, last Saturday, February 4, with the death of Robert E. Trumbule, specialist in environmental policy for the Congressional Research Service, the Congress lost a valuable resource. Bob Trumbule exemplified the highest professional standards and the best analytical tradition of the supporting staff that serves the Congress.

From his analytical vantage point in CRS, Bob played a leading role in the acid rain policy debate. A 1975 committee print he authored was one of the first to identify acid rain as an emerging issue. He was an early analyst of the possible approaches the Federal Government and the private sector might take in dealing with the problem of acid rain. In particular, he explored opportunities for using new technologies to resolve this problem.

It was in this role that my staff and I found Bob Trumbule to be so valuable in helping us with the background and analysis of the acid rain issue. His ideas and his analyses were important contributions to the development of the bill I have introduced on the issue, S. 2215. Moreover, I know that he contributed also to the efforts of other colleagues and Members, including those on the other side of the aisle and in the other Chamber, and always regardless of their position on the issue. He was always available to assist the many committees and Members of Congress who needed information and assistance on the difficult and complex issue.

In the evolution of this issue, Bob Trumbule became central to the network of experts on all sides of the debate. For example, he was an active member of a negotiation exercise on acid rain that brought together government, congressional, and private sector actors to debate approaches; he participated in the Federal Government's acid rain assessment group; and he was a frequent speaker and panelist at acid rain conferences and symposia, with the sponsors ranging from industry to environmental groups. With these many contacts, he became a key facilitator in the transfer of ideas and information on the subject.

Bob's keen intelligence, his enthusiasm, and most of all, his obviously deeply felt desire to be of genuine help in moving the acid rain debate in the most constructive channels impressed all who dealt with him. My staff and I found his briefings and presentations of the utmost value. His expertise will be missed by all his congressional colleagues, and the friendships he fostered while interacting with so mnay diverse interests in this and other issue areas will long be remembered.●

HUNGER IN AMERICA

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor Senate Resolution 306 which rejects the proposal by the President's Task Force on Food Assistance Programs to combine the food stamp program and other Federal food assistance programs into a block grant to the States. These valuable nutrition programs must remain national programs in order to be responsive to the growing number of American citizens who suffer from hunger.

During the past 3 years, Members of Congress, Government agencies, and a number of private organizations have conducted studies on the hunger problem in America. These studies and reports indicate that for the first time since the 1960's, hunger in America is on the rise. During this period our country has endured a severe recession and high unemployment. Yet, at the same time, the administration has made dramatic cuts in the food stamp, child nutrition and other Federal food assistance programs which serve the needy. The demand for food assistance is much greater than the resources available to private and public agencies attempting to provide relief to our Nation's hungry.

Although the President was "perplexed" to read reports of hunger in the land of plenty, and his chief adviser doubts whether people attending soup kitchens are truly needy, there is a substantial body of evidence which shows that large number of Americans are having difficulty getting enough to eat.

The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities conducted a national survey of local food banks last spring. In over half of 181 emergency food programs surveyed, the number of individuals seeking food assistance increased by 50 percent or more between February 1982 and February 1983.

The General Accounting Office issued a report last year on "Public and Private Efforts to Feed America's Poor." The GAO reported that there have been significant increases in the number of persons seeking food aid and that "an unmet need remains."

The U.S. Conference of Mayors reported in 1982 that a majority of 55 cities surveyed identified food as the emergency service most in demand. In a study completed last year, eight cities reported significant increases in demand for emergency food assistance and cited both budget cuts and unemployment as the cause.

The reports by these public and private organizations of growing hunger in America is confirmed by the growth of demand for Federal food assistance programs. Despite tightened eligibility rules and benefit reductions, Federal expenditures for food stamps, child nutrition and other Federal food programs grew from $14 billion in 1980 to $19 billion in 1983. Participation in food assistance programs is generally higher than it was 3 years ago. However, there remains an unmet need.

The WIC program provides food supplements and nutrition counseling to only one-third of those low-income women, infants and children who qualify for it. This program is credited with a reduction in the incidence of low-birth-weight infants. A Harvard University study found that because of the reduced incidence of low-birthweight infants needing extended hospital care after birth, each $1 spent in the prenatal component of WIC actually saves $3 in hospital costs. Great progress could be made if all eligible women, infants, and children were reached with this program. Yet the Reagan administration has repeatedly tried to slash funding for WIC, and merge it into a block grant to the States.

I am pleased that Congress has rejected these proposals, but I think we should do more. I have set as national goals eliminating nutritional deficiencies among pregnant women, infants and children, and lowering our infant mortality rate. Over a 4-year period, phased-in increases in the WIC program would allow us to reach all of the people who are eligible, thus giving poor children a much brighter start in life.

The food stamp program serves 21 million low-income Americans, yet 34 million Americans currently live in poverty. The average food stamp benefit is just 47 cents per person per meal. Emergency food agencies almost universally report substantial increases in requests for help toward the end of the month, when food stamp allotments have been exhausted. The Reagan administration has continually proposed cuts in this program even though the deep recession and high unemployment have increased the need for assistance.

I believe we should be doing more to help poor children, the elderly, the unemployed, and the working poor receive adequate nutrition. I have proposed an increase in food stamp benefits of 8 percent to help assure that monthly benefits truly last a month.

The school lunch and child nutrition programs have also undergone severe cuts during the last 3 years, resulting in nearly a million less children being served. The Reagan administration has proposed to merge the child care food program and the summer food program into a block grant with funding frozen at fiscal year 1985 levels. I propose that we improve that school lunch and child nutrition programs rather than gut them.

Prompted by alarming reports on increased hunger in the United States, the President last August appointed a task force on food assistance which has recently issued their final report. A major recommendation of the task force would have serious negative consequences for poor families. This proposal would give States the option to run their own food assistance programs with one fixed Federal appropriation. This approach would make food programs less responsive to need and would result in hardships during periods of economic recession.

Under the current food stamp program, more food stamps are automatically provided in a State if unemployment rises and more persons become poor. Similarly, more children in a State can automatically receive free school meals if unemployment rises. A needy family or poor child has an entitlement to these benefits, regardless of the State in which they live. Under the proposed block grant program, however, the entitlement to individuals would end. States would receive fixed amounts of funds. If the amount proved insufficient, benefits would have to be cut or needy persons would have to be dropped from the State's program.

The task force has attempted to respond to this issue by indicating that the Federal appropriation for each State would be adjusted periodically to reflect changes in food costs and the needy population. However, State unemployment rates are not known until several months after the rate actually rises or falls, and State population data is typically several years out of date. This approach is incapable of assuring that when additional needy persons apply for food stamps or free meals in a State, the funds will be there to meet the increased need on a prompt basis. In addition, a fixed block grant program under which the allocations to State varied quarterly or monthly would be almost impossible for the States to administer, as benefit levels and eligibility criteria would be altered frequently.

The block grant approach for food assistance could lead to benefit reductions for vulnerable poor families who lack political influence. Welfare payment levels vary from State to State, and the current food stamp program automatically helps narrow this gap by providing more food stamp benefits to persons who are poorer because their State pays low benefits. When States set their eligibility limits for food stamps in the 1960's, some States set eligibility cutoffs at only about half the poverty line. These wide variances were eased when we established uniform national food program standards in the 1970's. Under the block grant approach, 15 years of progress would be wiped away. By eliminating uniform standards the most vulnerable groups in our society—minorities, women and children, the elderly and others—would have to fight for scarce resources.

Hunger is a serious national problem. We must renew our national commitment to providing adequate food assistance. Congress has demonstrated support for Federal nutrition programs by rejecting block grant proposals and further benefit reductions that have been proposed by the President. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution which rejects the task force's recommendation to dismantle the Federal nutrition programs. We must retain a strong Federal role in the fight against hunger.●

NINE MYTHS ABOUT IMMIGRATION

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, there has been, during the course of our recent and continuing debate over immigration reform, a great deal said over the impact of immigration upon the United States.

We have heard that immigrants are "welfare abusers," that undocumented aliens heavily use welfare services, and that immigrants pay less than their share of taxes.

Those of us who have followed these issues closely know such emotional charges are just that—accusations based upon fear. From many well-documented sources—including the General Accounting Office and the U.S. Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy—we know that the facts show immigrants pay their way, and undocumented aliens are, in many respects, undocumented taxpayers.

Added to this research is a recent essay circulated by the Heritage Foundation entitled "Nine Myths About Immigration," written by Prof. Julian Simon, who is a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation and a professor at the University of Maryland.

For those Members of Congress who are constantly badgered by complaints over the impact of current immigration trends, I believe Professor Simon's concluding thoughts—based upon extensive research—should prove reassuring. He concludes:

> Exactly how beneficial immigrants are to the U.S. society and economy may be debated. What is certain, however, is that many of the alleged costs of immigrants are simply unfounded, hollow myths.

Mr. President, I commend Professor Simon's provocative essay to my colleagues and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The essay follows:

NINE MYTHS ABOUT IMMIGRATION

(By Julian L. Simon)

INTRODUCTION

Immigration is one of the most complicated topics of our times. Society and Congress are struggling with the problem in the form of the Simpson-Mazzoli bill, which is now before the Senate and House (S. 529 and H.R. 1510). The issue of immigration seems to pit two fundamental values—lending a helping hand to strangers and ensuring the economic self-interest of family and community—against one another. Also involved are values that may not appeal to all but which are in no way irrational, such as maintaining some degree of cultural or racial homogeneity in the country (Margaret Thatcher has spoken for that in the case of Great Britain) and keeping a particular political balance.

Wherever it may lead, a debate on U.S. immigration policy ought to be based on facts. Regrettably, a number of myths about immigration work against a reasoned debate. The sum of these myths is that immigrants lower the standard of living of U.S. natives. This simply is not supported by the evidence. In the interests of an informed debate on immigration, these myths must be examined.

MYTH NO. 1: IMMIGRANTS ARE WELFARE ABUSERS

It is frequently alleged that immigrants no sooner arrive in the U.S. than they become public charges, draining welfare money from the U.S. taxpayers and paying no taxes. Solid evidence gives the lie to this charge.[1]

In 1976 the Census Bureau interviewed 156,000 households (including about 15,000 immigrant families) to learn about 1975 family income and welfare services patterns. From this sample was constructed a picture of lifetime economic behavior by assuming that the information on immigrants who had been here, say, two years, or ten years, as of 1975 described the representative immigrant family after two years, or after ten years, and so on.

The services that most often catch the public eye are welfare and supplemental security, unemployment compensation, aid to dependent children, and food stamps. The average native-born U.S. family received $498 from these programs in 1975 (calculations include families getting no assistance). The average for immigrant families that arrived between 1950 and 1974 was $548. Not much difference. For immigrant and native families of similar education and age, there is no difference.

Of course there may be some systematic abuses of the welfare system by immigrants. But the U.S. legislative system surely can devise adequate remedies. Senator Charles Percy (R-Ill.), for example, sponsored a bill strengthening the requirement that sponsors of immigrants stand behind them financially to prevent their entering in order to go onto welfare. Nor would it be un-American to require immigrants to provide the American public some service in return for the benefits they receive. In the past, serving in the Army was such an example; it also had the side effect of quickly Americanizing the immigrants who served.

Providing school for immigrant children during an immigrant family's first five years in the U.S. costs slightly less than $859 for the average native family, because immigrants tend to come before they have children or while the children are still young. After that, school expenditures for immigrant families are higher than for native families, rising from $1,068 to $1,237 during the next 15 years. (The difference is not that immigrants have many children, but that the average native family is older with fewer children still in school.)

When public retirement programs are included—such as Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid—immigrant families on average are seen to receive much less in welfare payments and services than do average native families. Immigrants in fact lessen the Social Security burden upon native workers by contributing to the fund while not drawing from it. And if there is any single factor that cramps government economic policies right now, it is payments through Social Security, other pension plans, and other assistance to the elderly.

Immigrants typically arrive young and strong. Native U.S. families received in 1975 on average $735 for Social Security, $167 for Medicare and $20 for Medicaid, a total of $922. Immigrant families received a total of $92 during the first five years in the U.S., $227 in the second five years, $435 in the third five years, and $520 the fourth and fifth five-year periods. The difference in favor of natives is large. Immigrants thereby benefit natives.

But what about Social Security when immigrants reach retirement age? The answer depends not on entitlements or legal obligations, but on the flow of real resources from workers to retirees. In this way, the children of retired immigrants support their parents with their taxes, as in the case of natives. Hence the immigrant retirees do not increase the burden on natives.

In summing the figures for all the transfers and services, the average immigrant family is found to receive $1,404 in welfare services in years 1 to 5, $1,941 in years 6 to 10, $2,247 in years 11 to 15, and $2,279 in years 16 to 25. Native families overall average the same, $2,279 considerably more than the immigrants receive during their early years in the U.S. Figures for these early years are more relevant because in making rational for these early years are more relevant because in making rational policy decisions the distant future is weighted less heavily than the near future.

MYTH NO. 2: ILLEGALS MAKE ESPECIALLY HEAVY USE OF WELFARE SERVICES

Contrary to common belief, illegal immigrants from Mexico and elsewhere receive little in welfare services because of their illegal status. Labor researchers David North and Marion Houston of the New Trans Century Foundation found the following proportions of illegals using services: Free medical, 5 percent; unemployment insurance, 4 percent; food stamps, 1 percent; welfare payments, 1 percent; child schooling, 4 percent.[2] Practically no illegals receive the costliest service of all—Social Security. But 77 percent of illegal workers paid Social Security taxes, and 73 percent had federal income tax withheld. Several other studies using a variety of research methods reveal similar results. The low use of social services is largely because the illegals are afraid of being apprehended. And among the illegal Mexicans, more than 80 percent are male, half are single (most of the married men leave their wives and children in Mexico), and most are youthful (less 10 percent of the workers are over 35) and need few services.

MYTH NO. 3: IMMIGRANTS PAY LESS THAN THEIR SHARE OF TAXES

If immigrants paid relatively little in taxes, it could be argued that they still burden natives, even with fewer welfare services for immigrants than for natives. While there is no direct information on taxes paid, data on family earnings allow a reliable estimate.

Within three to five years after entry, immigrant family earnings reach and pass those of the average native family, because of the variance in age composition of native and immigrant families. The average native family paid $3,008 in taxes in 1975. In comparison, immigrant families here 10 years paid $3,359, those here 11 to 15 years paid $3,564, and those here 16 to 25 years paid $3,592. Such substantial differences benefit natives.

Assuming 20 percent of taxes finance activities that are little affected by population size (for example, maintaining the armed forces and the Statue of Liberty), the data on services used and taxes paid, taken together, show substantial differences that benefit natives: an average of $1,354 yearly for years 1 to 5, and $1,329, $1,535 and $1,353 for years 6 to 10, 11 to 15, and 16 to 25 respectively. These are the amounts by which each additional immigrant family enriches U.S. public coffers. Evaluating the future stream of differences as one would a dam or harbor, the present value of an immigrant family discounted at 3 percent (inflation adjusted) was $20,600 in 1975 dollars, almost two years average earnings for a native family: at 6 percent the present value is $15,800, and $12,400 at 9 percent.

MYTH NO. 4 IMMIGRANTS CAUSE NATIVES TO LOSE JOBS

The most politically powerful argument against admitting immigrants has been that they take jobs held by natives and thereby increase native unemployment. The logic is simple: If the number of jobs is fixed, and immigrants occupy some jobs, then there are fewer jobs available for natives.

In the immediated present, the demand for any particular sort of worker is indeed inflexible. And, therefore, additional immigrants in a given occupation, in theory, must have some negative impact on wages and/or employment among people in that occupation. For example, the large recent influx of foreign physicians means additional competition for U.S. physicians. There is good reason to believe that U.S. physicians will earn less because of immigrant physicians. Such negative effects upon particular occupations could be avoided only if immigrants were to come into all occupations in proportion to the size of those occupations. Workers whose occupations immigrants enter disproportionately can therefore be expected to complain.

Theory says that there must be some unemployment in some sectors. But theory does not say whether the effect will be huge or trivial. For this, empirical research is needed. The effect is difficult to measure, because natives move away from areas with high unemployment to areas where it is lower, and immigrants move there, too, thereby obscuring the impact of immigration. Nevertheless, if immigrants were to cause large amounts of unemployment in particular industries, the phenomenon would surely be noticeable. Yet no empirical study has found such unemployment in noticeable amounts.

Even in the few sectors, such as the restaurant and hotel industries, where immigrants concentrate, there tends not to be a deleterious effect on natives because natives do not want these jobs. Evidence comes from experiments conducted by the Immigration and Naturalization Service together with San Diego County. In one case, 2,154 illegal aliens were removed from jobs, and the California State Human Resources Agency tried without success to fill the jobs with U.S. citizens. The County of San Diego Human Resources Agency reported:

"Some of the reasons for the failure were: (1) most employers paid less than the minimum wage rate, (2) the job categories were not appealing to the local resident (a matter of prestige), and (3) applicants were discouraged by not only the low wages but also the difficulty of some jobs, and the long hours demanded by the employers."[3]

Research also does not show across-the-board unemployment caused by immigrants, either in the U.S. as a whole or in particular areas of relatively high immigration. Heretofore such studies have been rather casual. Therefore, research assistant Stephen Moore and the author recently mounted a systematic attempt to detect whether such immigrant-caused unemployment exists in significant amount. Still no such effect is observable. It seems fair to conclude therefore that, while in theory immigration ought to produce some unemployment in the short run, the amount is in fact negligible. And in the long run, when there is not even a theoretical reason to believe that immigration causes unemployment, there is no reason at all to think that it does.

One reason that umemployment is not caused is that potential immigrants have considerable awareness of labor-market conditions in the U.S. and tend not to come if there is little demand for their skills. Also, immigrants tend to be varied in their skills and therefore do not have a disproportionate impact on a few industries. At the same time—this point is crucial, but too little understood—immigrants increase demand for labor across the range of occupations, because immigrants consume goods as well as produce them.

Another reason, then, for the absence of unemployment caused by immigrants is that they not only take jobs, they make jobs. Immigrants not only create new jobs indirectly with their spending, they create new jobs directly with new businesses, which they are more likely than natives to start. A Canadian government survey, which should be similar to U.S. experience, finds that almost five percent of the 2,037 immigrants surveyed had started their own businesses within the first three years in Canada. Not only did they employ themselves, they employed others, "creating" a total of 606 jobs. Expressed as a proportion of the 2,037 total immigrants, roughly 30 percent as many jobs were created from scratch as total jobs were held by immigrants. Furthermore, these numbers rose rapidly after the three-year study period; after one year there were 71 self-employed immigrants creating 264 jobs, compared with the 91 and 606 respectively after three years.

The businesses immigrants start are small at first, but small businesses are the most important source of new jobs, according to a recent MIT study.

Historically, migrants have tended to enter in good times and leave during bad, thus buffering unemployment for citizens, another positive effect of immigrants upon the labor market. Furthermore, a much lower proportion of immigrants work for government than do natives (perhaps 8 percent compared to 16 percent). This indicates a relatively low burden on the government to help supply jobs even after they have been in the U.S. many years. This should have a beneficial effect upon overall native chances for employment. It also benefits natives because a disproportionately small number of immigrants are making use of public productive capital.

MYTH NO. 5: IMMIGRANTS PUSH WAGES WAY DOWN

The impact of immigration is likely to be greater on wages than on unemployment rates, because potential immigrants with skills that are in low demand choose not to migrate, and those with saleable skills gravitate to industries where there are jobs. This will have some downward pressure on wages. For example, immigrant physicians are more likely to reduce a native physician's yearly income than to throw him or her out of work.

Economists Barton Smith and Robert Newman of the University of Houston found that adjusted wages are just 8 percent lower in the Texas border cities,[4] where the proportion of Mexicans is relatively high, compared to Texas cities away from the border where the proportion of Mexicans is much lower, a considerably smaller difference than they had expected to find. Much of the apparent difference is accounted for by a lower cost of living in the border cities.

MYTH NO. 6: IMMIGRANTS ARE "HUDDLED MASSES"—UNEDUCATED, UNSKILLED, AND "TIRED"

The belief that immigrants arrive now, as they did in the past, with little or no education, few marketable skills, and in a generally tired and depressed condition is one of the most powerful, least accurate, and most persevering myths about immigration. This description is found in many books and articles including Oscar Handlin's famous, The Uprooted.[5]

The central fact about immigrants now, as throughout U.S. history and in almost all places at almost all times, is that immigrants are just entering into the prime of work life. This is the very best time to make a maximum contribution in all ways to the country receiving them. In contrast, the U.S. resident population is rapidly aging. But the immigrants are concentrated in their twenties and thirties, when they are flexible about job and geographical location, and therefore contribute importantly to the constant adjustment of the economy to changing conditions. They are of the age of greatest physical and mental vigor. And in this age bracket they contribute heavily to old-age support while requiring relatively little welfare service from the public coffers. See Table 1 for the age distributions of the U.S. public at large of and recent immigrants.

TABLE 1.—DISTRIBUTIONS BY AGE OF LEGAL IMMIGRANTS AND U.S. POPULATION

[2] Charles B. Keely and Ellen P. Kraly, "Recent Net Alien Immigration to the U.S.: Its Impact on Population Growth and Native Fertility," talk to the Population Association of America, 1978.

Even more surprising is that immigrants on average have as much education as do natives. Contemporary cohorts of immigrants include somewhat larger proportions of persons of low skill and low education than does the native labor force, but they contain a much larger proportion of those of high skill and high education—physicians, engineers, scientific researchers, and the like—than does the native population. And recent research by economist P. J. Hill of Montana State University and others shows that even before the turn of the century cohorts of immigrants compared favorably with the native populations with respect to education and skill.[6] This makes sense. A person with little education and skill is not necessarily stupid, and understands that life without saleable human capital is particularly tough in a new and strange environment, and therefore that it is wiser to stay at home. On the other hand, it is sensible for a person with a good amount of saleable human capital to take the chance and immigrate, because such a person has a good chance to improve his or her lot by moving to a new and richer country.

Along with youth and skill, immigrants tend to bring an unusually high degree of self-reliance, initiative, and innovative flair. Again, it makes sense that it is such people, rather than the dull and frightened, who have the courage and the belief in themselves necessary to the commitment to the awesome change that international migration represents.

MYTH NO. 7: IMMIGRANTS INCREASE PRESSURE UPON RESOURCES AND ENVIRONMENT

Still another unfounded charge is that immigrants create a squeeze in natural resources for natives. For example, Zero Population Growth's honorary president, Paul R. Ehrlich, talks about the effect of additional people on the "perilously shrinking water supply in this country. And our food supply. Think of the competition they'll cause for housing and jobs." The basis is the assertion that "The United States in less than 50 years will be more crowded, more polluted, more ecologically unstable, more prone to political unrest, more burdened with social stress, and far, far more precarious than we can possibly imagine."[7]

These predictions are without foundation. The water and food supplies consumed in the U.S. have been improving in past decades by every reasonable measure of quantity and purity, though this appears to be little known. The air, moreover, is becoming less polluted, according to the official Pollutant Standard Index prepared by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency.[8] And over the long run, natural resources are becoming less scarce rather than more scarce, as indicated by the fundamental economic measure of cost.

But not all such propositions about the effects of immigrants upon resources can be rebutted so easily. For example, consider this statement in a 1981-1982 article called "Immigration and the American Conscience" by The Environmental Fund: "Had the United States stabilized its population in 1970, we could have the same level of energy consumption and standard of living as we do today without any Iranian oil or a single nuclear power plant." The statement probably is true. But even more probably, and much more important, the statement also is terribly misleading.

One important flaw in the statement is that the eleven years it encompasses is much too short a time for the most important effects of population change to have their effects. Babies take a quarter century to mature into producers of goods and ideas; even immigrants may require several years to reach their full productivity.

It takes even longer for a crucial historical cycle to take place: (a) an immigrant swelled population leads to greater use of natural resources; (b) prices of raw materials then rise; (c) the price rise and the resultant fear about scarcity impel individuals to seek new sources of raw materials, new production technologies, and new substitutes for the resource, and (d) eventually the price of the service provided by the resource in question—for example, the price of energy whether produced from wood, coal, oil, or nuclear power—falls lower than it was before the temporary scarcity began. This process takes time and is quite indirect. Yet it has been the mainspring of economic advance for 5,000 years. It is, however, obscured by the above quotation, which makes it seem as if the main effect of the additional people is bad. In fact, after a relatively short time, the main effect is that people are better off than if the whole cycle beginning with more people had not taken place.

A stationary population in the long run would have a lower economic level than a growing population. Imagine the results 100 or 500 years later, or today, of stabilizing world population in 1000 B.C., 1 A.D., 1000 A.D., 1750 A.D., or 1900 A.D. A key characteristic of a high level of economic civilization is that it contains the capacity to resolve newly arising problems more quickly than did lower economic civilization. For example, the incidence of famine has declined sharply in the past century because of modern roads and other transportation systems. Food scarcity as a result of rapid population growth took much longer to remedy in 1300 A.D. or 1600 A.D. than now, because of today's systematic ways of finding and applying new knowledge that will meliorate the scarcity.

Much of The Ultimate Resource shows that natural resources (including energy) are, with passing decades, less rather than more of a constraint to U.S. and world growth. To cite such "limits" in discussions of national policy is unsound geology and biology, incorrect history, and terrible economics. The progressive improvement that has occurred in the world's resource availability would not have taken place if population density had remained at the lower levels of earlier centuries and millennia.

MYTH NO. 8: IMMIGRANTS CAUSE DIMINISHING RETURNS

The heart of the Malthusian objection to immigration is "capital dilution." This means that because of the theory of "diminishing returns" output per worker will fall. This argument is so marvelously simple, direct, and common-sensical that it has great seductive power, especially to academics. The Malthusian notion therefore is grist for any family newspaper. The arguments that demonstrate the inapplicability of Malthusian capital dilution in the context of immigration are relatively complex and indirect. As a consequence, editors who fear that such arguments will tax the attention and thought of their readers and listeners protect their audiences from such a terrible fate. And the field is therefore left to simple—though incorrect—Malthusianism.

Nowadays the most important capital is human capital—education and the skills that adults own and carry with them—rather than the "capitalist" supplying all the capital. Still, there is some harm to natives caused by the presence of more workers but the same capital.

If the private sector of the economy were like the government sector—where workers' pay is assumed equal to the full value of what they produce, with nothing left for the owner of the capital—then capital dilution would indeed lower average native income. But in the private sector, additional workers imply higher earnings for owners about equal to the loss of earnings by other workers. This trade-off leaves overall native per capita income roughly unchanged.

Yet "workers" suffer as "capitalists" gain. That is, to the extent that the classes are separate, there is a transfer from workers' pockets to owners' pockets. But in fact much of America's private capital is owned directly by "workers" through pension funds and by way of the taxes paid on interest and dividends. Hence the loss to the "worker" class is unclear.

As to special groups of workers, especially low-income earners, the negative effect is probably less than commonly thought and may be nonexistent. Because legal immigrants arrive with considerable education and skills and enter a wide variety of occupations, they hurt no occupation or income level much, even in the short run. (And to repeat, in the long run, occupations on average benefit from additional jobs created by the purchases made by immigrants to about the same extent that immigrants take existing jobs within the occupations. In short, immigrants make jobs as well as take jobs.)

Regarding the public capital used by immigrants, there should be concern about the additional capital outlays needed to equip immigrants—the extra schoolrooms, hospital beds, firehouses, and the like. Not relevant is the use of public goods not affecting natives' use or pocketbooks—looking at the Washington Monument or riding on a lightly used interstate highway. And to a considerable extent, the U.S. is on a pay-as-you-go basis with respect to capital expenditures: The debt service on past public borrowings covers much of the outlay on new capital. Therefore, through their taxes, immigrants pay "rent" on public facilities. This is an important additional reason why Malthusian capital dilution is not a crucial problem.

MYTH NO. 9: THE UNITED STATES IS FLOODED BY MEXICAN ILLEGALS

The number of aliens illegally residing and working in the United States is an issue that enters into the discussion of immigration in many ways. It is the main focus of the writings of those who oppose immigration, and it is used to generate strong feelings on the grounds that it causes a breakdown in the law and order of the country and corrupts attitudes toward the law. The issue also is used to suggest that the United States is rendered vulnerable to invasion or other unnamed dangers because it has "lost control of its borders." The Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR) and The Environmental Fund (TEF), the two organizations most active in fighting against immigration, dwell upon the word "control." This plays upon a fear of chaos and social breakdown. And the supposed large-scale loss of jobs by natives due to illegals is a major objection to immigration generally, including that by labor unions.

Are such arguments justified by the data? Clearly not. The evidence for the largest and most frightening estimates of illegals is flimsy or nonexistent. In general there is a strong negative relationship between the quality of the research and the size of the estimate.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service frightened many with its 1970s estimates that there were 4 to 12 million illegals in the U.S. But a study by the Bureau of the Census staff at the request of the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy[9] noted that this estimate was based on nothing more than an impression derived from the data on the number of apprehensions of illegals either crossing the border or on the job. The INS gave no evidence in support of its estimate. And apprehension records are obviously a fallacious basis for any such estimate. For example, the same person might be apprehended several times during a single week.

Later the INS shifted its estimate to 8.2 million persons, as of mid-1975, deriving the figure from a Lesko Associates study it commissioned.[10] The basis for the estimate was the "Delphi technique." This technique may be appropriate for such tasks as forecasting technological developments. But it is an absolutely unreliable and inappropriate estimation method for a subject such as the number of illegals in the U.S. Even Lesko called the estimate "not analytically defensible."[11] Yet for a long time these figures were the basis for much of the political debate on the subject.

The INS then offered an estimate of 6 million illegals as of 1975. This was derived by asking INS District Directors to estimate the number of illegals residing in their districts. According to the Bureau of the Census description:

"The district officers were asked to provide, in addition to estimates of illegals for their districts, a description of the methodology used to generate the estimates. None gave specific procedures. Rather, all but one referred to the 'experience' of officials as the basis for the estimate; the other claimed no 'scientific' basis at all for his estimate. Thus, the overall estimate may be characterized as 'synthetic speculation'."[12]

Ingenious statisticans have recently tackled the problem in a variety of interesting ways, including analysis of alien deaths in the United States,[13] changes in Mexico's population,[14] comparisons of data (such as Social Security and income tax records) in which illegal aliens are fairly sure to be counted,[15] analysis of changes in the Mexican-origin population reported by the Current Population Survey,[16] and surveys of persons returning to Mexico, and of Mexican families, concerning their migration histories.[17]

The harvest of findings from this body of work is as follows:

(1) The careful survey of these and other studies by Siegal et al. concludes that "The total number of illegal residents in the United States for some recent year, such as 1978, is almost certainly below 6.0 million, and may be substantially less, possibly only 3.5 to 5.0 million."[18]

(2) A considerable proportion of the illegals are not Mexican. "The available evidence indicates that the size of the Mexican population living illegally in the United States is smaller than popular estimates suggest. The Mexican component of the illegally resident population is almost certainly less than 3.0 million, and may be substantially less, possibly only 1.5 to 2.5 million."

(3) Of the Mexicans illegally in the United States at any given time, a very large proportion are here for a matter of months and then return voluntarily. "The gross movement into the United States of Mexican illegals is considerable, as is reflected in the large numbers of apprehensions made by INS, but this 'immigration' is largely offset by a considerable movement in the opposite direction. . . . Apparently most of the Mexican nationals who enter the United States illegally in any years return to Mexico. . . ."[19]

(4) Korns' study of illegal-alien employment even suggests that there has been no increase in the total number of illegals since an expansion that occurred between 1964 and 1969. The Census Bureau's Associate Director for Demographic Fields, George E. Hall, commented that "To date, the Census Bureau has not been able to detect explosive growth in the illegal population in any of its data collection systems."[20] It is because most immigrants who enter illegally leave when their jobs end or when they have earned what they came to earn, usually after a half-year or less, that there can be a constant inflow and yet little or no increase in the total number of immigrant residents.

(5) In contrast to the Mexicans, the non-Mexican illegals—who typically either overstay their visa periods or enter with fraudulent documents, rather than by crossing the border clandestinely without documents—are much less likely to return to the home countries. "Hence, non-Mexican illegal immigration may add to the permanent resident population to a far greater extent than the Mexican migration flows," conclude Siegel et al., on the basis of the studies surveyed. This last point suggests that expensive efforts to reduce clandestine border crossing may be a waste.

CONCLUSION

Just about all the individual economic objections to immigrants are without factual foundation. No mention has been made, moreover, of the benefits from immigration. And there are very large benefits. Improved productivity, as a result of the increased production volume that flows from immigrant purchasing power as well as from the additional supply of ingenious inventive minds that immigrants bring, is one of the most important such benefits. It quickly dominates all the short-run costs.

Exactly how beneficial immigrants are to the U.S. society and economy may be debated. What is certain, however, is that many of the alleged costs of immigrants are simply unfounded, hollow myths.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, paragraph 2 of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate requires that each committee of the Senate publish its rules not later than March 1 of each year.

Therefore, I submit for the RECORD the rules of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry. The rules are as follows:

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

1. Regular meetings shall be held on the first and third Wednesday of each month when Congress is in session.

2. Voting by proxy authorized in writing for specific bills or subjects shall be allowed whenever a majority of the committee is actually present.

3. To assure the equitable assignment of members to subcommittees, no member of the committee will receive assignment to a second subcommittee until, in order of seniority, all members of the committee have chosen assignments to one subcommittee, and no member shall receive assignment to a third subcommittee until, in order of seniority, all members have chosen assignments to two subcommittees.

4. Six members shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of transacting committee business: Provided, That for the purpose of receiving sworn testimony, a quorum of the committee and each subcommittee thereof shall consist of one member.[1]

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, next week, during our Lincoln's Birthday recess, Lithuanians throughout the world, including 832,000 in this country, will pause to mark the 66th anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day. As has been my custom in the past, I would like to say a few words about this anniversary and the Lithuanian people's ongoing struggle for independence.

[1] For further restrictions with respect to proxies and quorums in the reporting of measures and recommendations, see rule XXVI, paragraph 7, of the Standing Rules of the Senate.

It was on February 16, 1918, that Lithuanian patriots established a Lithuanian Republic guaranteeing, among other rights, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, and freedom of religion. This brave and inspiring experiment came to a tragic end some 22 years later, when Soviet Russia annexed Lithuania by force, together with her Baltic sister states of Latvia and Estonia.

Freedom quickly was extinguished in the area. Lithuanians were deported to Soviet slave labor camps. A policy of Russification sought—and still seeks—to stamp out the Lithuanian language and ethnic heritage. Lithuanians suffered—and still suffer—in Soviet prisons for their efforts to keep alive their national traditions.

Still, against great odds and with inspiring valor, the Lithuanian people have retained their spirit of independence. Their unshakable belief in freedom has enabled them to endure Communist oppression and to continue the struggle to break free from Soviet rule.

To its credit, the United States has never recognized the Soviet annexation of Lithuania. Nor will Lithuanian Americans rest until their brethren behind the Iron Curtain are no longer slaughtered, deported, exiled, imprisoned, or committed to psychiatric institutions by their oppressors.

Mr. President, this country has been enriched by the values brought here by those of Lithuanian descent. My own hometown of Omaha has been particularly fortunate to have an active Lithuanian American community contributing to its economy, its institutions and its culture. I wish to pay special tribute to the members of the Omaha Lithuanian American community at this time.

Finally, Mr. President, as Lithuanians around the country prepare for next week's observance, I want to join in expressing support for the 3.2 million Lithuanians still living under Soviet domination. We must send a clear signal that we have not abandoned these brave patriots. We must help keep alive the spirit and traditions of the Lithuanian nation. We must continue to champion the cause of freedom and independence for the Lithuanian people.●

IN RECOGNITION OF LUIGI PIRANDELLO

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in recognition of a unique heritage, a cultural style that has influenced all of the world—Pirandello. Pirandello is now an international force in the theater.

Luigi Pirandello developed a very novel way to present drama. As a playwright he was so exceptional that he won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1934. He has been recognized as the most seminal dramatist of our time. His style is accessible to all cultures.

Each year, the Centro Nazionale di Studi Pirandelliana sponsors an international conference on some of the many aspects of Pirandello's work. The Pirandello Society of America also honors this Nobel winner. In fact, scholars and theater companies are attracted from around the world, especially to study and analyze such seminal works as "Six Characters in Search of an Author."

Mr. President, the great work of Luigi Pirandello should never be forgotten. Therefore, it is appropriate that we show our recognition of this man today and in the days to come.●

THE CONABLE CONSCIENCE

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the news that BARBER CONABLE will be retiring from Congress was sad news on both sides of the aisle and both sides of Capitol Hill. For 20 years Rochester has benefited from BARBER CONABLE's diligence, concern, ability, and honor. Indeed, so have we all. The Congress will be a lesser body without him, and the knowledge hurts. I shall miss BARBER CONABLE.

Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an editorial from the New York Times. It is entitled "The Conable Conscience" and pays able tribute to this fine New Yorker. I ask that, this editorial—perhaps I should say tribute—be printed in the RECORD.

The tribute follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 8, 1984]

THE CONABLE CONSCIENCE

He wrote the big "10-5-3" investment tax incentive bill for corporations in 1981 and, as ranking Republican on the Ways and Means Committee, skillfully guided it through the House. But that didn't mean he was a patsy for the wealthy. Barber Conable vigorously opposes tax deductions for executive fringes like country club memberships and personal chauffeurs.

As a Republican and an incumbent, he has always stood to gain from an electoral system that heavily depends on campaign financing from special interests. But since 1967, when he joined Ways and Means, Barber Conable has refused to accept campaign contributions of more than $50.

He vociferously defends the idea that members of Congress should be able to earn enough to live in comfort. But he abhors the idea of raising his own salary and has consistently voted against Congressional pay raises.

Representative Conable is a fiscal conservative and enemy of big government who opposes middle-class raids on the Treasury like tax-exempt housing bonds and fat subsidies for dairy farmers. But he is a pramatist. Understanding the great value of social insurance, he helped draft the legislative compromise last year that restored the solvency of Social Security.

Barber Conable has represented Rochester for 20 years. In that time, says Charles Rangel, the Manhattan Democrat, he has been "one of the hardest-working, most respected, most articulate people around." Mr. Conable has announced that he will not run again this year. It will be a loss not only for his constituents but for us all.●

ORDER FOR SENATE RESOLUTION 337 TO BE PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have an item that I believe has been cleared on the other side. I inquire of the minority leader if he has any objection to placing on the calendar a resolution introduced by the distinguished Senators from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS and Mr. MURKOWSKI).

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no objection.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution I just identified be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR H.R. 1557 TO BE PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a request that appears to be cleared on both sides.

I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 1557, for the relief of William D. Benoni, be held at the desk pending further consideration.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I will not object—I am aware that a Member of the other body, on the other side of the aisle, is very interested in this matter. I would have no objection to smooth out the path for passage of this measure if the majority leader would prefer to put it on the calendar, and it would appear on the calendar tomorrow.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader. That would indeed help, especially since I hope we may be able to go out tomorrow instead of Friday.

What that means is that if it did not go on the calendar today, we could not deal with it tomorrow, under the practice established recently that we do not take up matters that are not printed on the calendar.

I appreciate the suggestion, and I am sure the colleague in the House appreciates it as well.

Mr. President, in response to the suggestion by the minority leader, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 1557 be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO EL SALVADOR

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I understand that there is a message at the desk from the House on H.R. 4656. Am I correct in that understanding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed with first reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 4656) to continue in effect the current certification requirements with respect to El Salvador until the Congress enacts new legislation providing conditions for United States military assistance to El Salvador or until the end of fiscal year 1984, whichever occurs first.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the majority leader is aware of what I am attempting to do here and is prepared, I am sure, as I would be, to object to the next request.

I ask that the Senate proceed to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do object to further proceedings on the bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Second reading will occur the next legislative day.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader for advising me in advance that he intended to proceed under the provisions of rule XIV toward placing this bill on the calendar, which he has a perfect right to do. The procedure we have just gone through is the accepted and standard procedure which will ultimately lead to the placement of this bill on the calendar.

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are other things we can do, but I am prepared to postpone them until the morning, if the minority leader has no immediate need for action on any of the several items in our folder for action by unanimous consent.

The only remaining item, then, is to set a time for the Senate to convene tomorrow and, if possible, to set a time for the vote on cloture.

I hope we could come in, say, at 11 a.m. I am not making this request at this time but merely prescribing it. We would come in at 11 a.m., or earlier, if that seems desirable.

There would be time for the two leaders, which would consume 20 minutes, and a brief time for the transaction of routine morning business. At 11:30 a.m., we would resume consideration of this bill.

At 1:30 p.m., the vote on cloture would begin, and we would waive the mandatory quorum under the provisions of rule XXII.

As to the vote, the order provides for 15 minutes, but I would be willing to predict that it would be 30 minutes, and we estimate that we would be finished about 2 p.m., with the vote on cloture.

As I indicated earlier, if cloture is invoked—and I hope it will be—then it will not be the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to proceed further with that measure until we have returned from the Lincoln Day period.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have asked the distinguished majority leader if it would be possible to delay the beginning of that vote until, say, 2 p.m., and have a 30-minute time limit on the rollcall. But the distinguished majority leader, after exploring and inquiring on his side, is not able to do that. I say that for the RECORD.

Having said that, would it be possible for the majority leader to consider coming in at 11:30 a.m., and perhaps cutting the time for the two leaders to 1 minute each? And can he come in at that time and still work out his schedule so that he can reach a vote at the time he desires?

The reason I make this request is the Appropriation Subcommittee is meeting tomorrow at 10 a.m., and I understand it will involve some matters in which I have an interest. I wish to be able to attend that meeting.

Mr. BAKER. The Senator should be able to attend that.

The only thing that is left that would be interferred with would be that folder of routine business that I had thought we might do during leader time, but we can do that after the vote tomorrow. I do not have any problem with that.

We could come in at 11:30 a.m., and be on the bill at not later than 11:35 a.m., and then we will have until 1:30 p.m., and waive the quorum, with the full expectation that the vote will be over by 2 p.m.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader. So the vote would start at 1:30 p.m.?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Would the majority leader be willing at this time, and I have not approached the majority leader on this request, to stretch that vote to 30 minutes?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. By consent?

Mr. BAKER. By consent.

Mr. BYRD. Very well.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the minority leader.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. President, then I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 11:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER REDUCING LEADERSHIP TIME TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow and tomorrow only the time under the standing order assigned to the two leaders be reduced to 1 minute each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RESUMPTION OF UNFINISHED BUSINESS AND TIME FOR VOTE TO OCCUR TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after that time, the Senate resume consideration of the unfinished business and that at 1:30 p.m. the vote occur on cloture pursuant to the motion heretofore filed and that the mandatory quorum required by rule XXII in preparation for the vote be waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER THAT THE VOTE AT 1:30 P.M. TOMORROW BE 30 MINUTES IN DURATION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that the time for the rollcall vote on this rollcall only be 30 minutes, to begin at 1:30 p.m. and to end at 2 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank all Senators and I especially thank the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

RECESS TO 11:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I think that covers the situation for today. I, therefore, move, in accordance with the order just entered, that the Senate now stand in recess until 11:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 6:49 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, February 9, 1984, at 11:30 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, February 8, 1984

The House met at 3 p.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Make us aware, O God, of the futility of trying to confine Your love to our pleasure and convenience. May we see, as did the Psalmist, that, "It is good to give thanks to the Lord, to sing praises to Thy name, O Most High; to declare Thy steadfast love in the morning, and Thy faithfulness by night * * *." Grant that we may always be open to Your Majesty that towers above our understanding. May our spirits be listening to Your ever new and forgiving spirit that we will be inspired to be more loving and gracious in our daily lives. Amen.

Mr. SMITH of Florida and Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

So the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, had I voted on rollcall No. 21, I would have voted "no."●

REDEPLOYMENT OF MARINES IS CORRECT DECISION

(Mr. SKELTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, the President's decision yesterday to redeploy the U.S. marines from their ground positions in Lebanon was a correct decision, but I lament the fact that this decision came 263 deaths too late.

As I have stated numerous times over the past year, these men should never have been placed in this position in the first place. Marines are fighting men, and militarily it was a poor decision to give them this mission impossible. It is high time the President responded to the growing demands of the American people to remove our troops from danger in Lebanon.

I am glad that the President has made this decision now, instead of waiting for a complete breakdown of order in Lebanon and another disaster.

IT'S NOT FUNNY, MR. PRESIDENT

(Mr. COELHO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, last Friday the friends and supporters of our distinguished colleague, Congresswoman KATIE HALL held a luncheon for her in Gary, Ind.

The honored guest of that luncheon was the Speaker of the House.

I would like to share with you the words of the benediction given by Rev. Charles Doyle. His remarks deserve repeating. They deserve to be heard by every citizen concerned about the course of national policy-making.

Father Doyle began by referring to that odd moment in last month's state of the Union address when President Regan interrupted his prepared remarks to ask "Did I say something funny?"

Father Doyle did not think so. He gave us his own personal answer to the President's question.

"It wasn't funny," he said;

To the laidoff steelworker. It wasn't funny to the ADC mother trying to make it on $196 a month; not funny to the unemployed father whose food stamps have been cut back; not funny to the third-grader who doesn't have a workbook; nor to the parents of the Marines in Lebanon; not to the rest of us who sit in the shadow of the nuclear bomb.

He ended his remarks with a personal tribute to the Speaker, a tribute that my colleagues would be glad to second. "With a little help from you," Father Doyle told the Speaker;

We, the people, will bring a smile to their faces through the courage and conviction of our friend KATIE HALL who uses you as the model of their concern for the disadvantaged. Guide them. Strengthen them. Help them feel your caring presence, and ours.

Mr. Speaker, I have just one word to add to those of Father Doyle. Amen.

BUDGET FAKERY

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, last week several of our Republican colleagues started the practice of making personal attacks on those Democratic Members who were so bold as to speak out against the disastrous economic policies of the Reagan administration, particularly the deficit built into the budget submitted by the President for fiscal year 1985.

In an understandable effort to divert attention from the President's embarrassing policies, the attackers referred to what they described as 18 key amendments to last year's appropriation and authorization bills. They implied that votes on these amendments were a kind of litmus test as to the bona fides of the Members criticizing the President's deficits.

It seemed strange to me that the attackers made no effort to identify these so-called key amendments. When I finally obtained the list from the minority staff, I could see why. Some of the amendments were quite insignificant from a budget standpoint. Others are simply egregious examples of legislative games playing, with no practical budgetary effect, or with effects quite different from those claimed.

For example, rollcall No. 217 in the last session was on a motion by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) to recommit H.R. 1183 with instructions. The instructions would have directed Congress simply to reduce outlays by $12 billion in fiscal year 1984. Since there was no specification as to where the cuts were to be made or in what amounts, the actual effect would have been zero, as its proponents surely knew.

Another example: Rollcall No. 315 was on a motion by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. TAUKE) to recommit with an amendment to reduce funding for health care for the handicapped. The amendment would have reduced the authorization from $1.87 billion in fiscal year 1984 and $1.54 billion in fiscal year 1985 to $900 million for each year, a total saving of $1.61 billion in 2 years. However, the minority lists this as a savings of $4 billion. It almost looks as though this arithmetic were done by the same people who wrote the President's budget.

Rollcall No. 386 was on an amendment by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FLORIO) to substitute preferred stock for Amtrak's $800 million debt. Since Amtrak is wholly owned by the United States, defeat of the amendment did not represent any savings at all.

Mr. Speaker, subtracting the fake savings from these 18 amendments, the best that can be said is that they might have produced savings of $4.72 billion in fiscal year 1984. While this is a substantial sum, it amounts to less than 2.5 percent of the $194 billion deficit projected for this fiscal year.

By way of comparison, last year I voted for amendments which would have produced savings of $13.76 billion and increased revenues of $2.68 billion, for a total of $16.44 billion in deficit reduction. In addition, I voted against appropriation bills totaling $265.1 billion, because I thought they represented grossly excessive spending.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I come to the fight to reduce the President's deficit with a credible record, not only in this Congress but in earlier ones. I am sure the same is true of other Democratic colleagues who have been so unfairly attacked for speaking out against the continuation of President Reagan's fiscally disastrous course. As to our Republican critics, I would only say, with apologies to one of their own who originated the phrase, "In their hearts they know we are right."

I WISH THE PRESIDENT HAD DONE IT SOONER

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, the President did the right thing in putting the marines back on the ships. I only wish he had done it sooner.

POSITIONING OF MARINES MADE NO SENSE

(Mr. AUCOIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Speaker, the White House has finally recognized that we cannot stop religious warfare, ethnic warfare, and class warfare by positioning U.S. marines on an airport runway. It made no military sense; it made no diplomatic sense.

But now the Pentagon tells us that there are new orders for our Navy to bomb more freely than ever the Moslem and Druze positions in and around Beirut.

Mr. Speaker, I oppose one more military move until someone can explain to my constituents what strategy this serves. Is this in support of a government that has already collapsed? Will this create more American prisoners of war? Will it heighten the danger of our diplomats who stay behind when the troops leave? Do we have goals that are so clear and so clearly attainable that they can justify killing Lebanese on the ground and risking the lives of Americans in the air?

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that anyone in the Pentagon or the National Security Agency or in the White House has those answers, and for that reason, I continue to oppose our policy in Lebanon.

BUDGET DEFICITS

(Mr. KOLTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, over the past 4 weeks, the stock market has continually gone down. Experts claim that the proposed $200 billion deficit in the President's 1985 Federal budget is responsible for all the pessimism on Wall street. The people of my district are also concerned about this record-breaking deficit. The current bipartisan discussions between the Congress and the White House are attempting to address this problem. Something must be done.

I would like the record to show what I have been hearing, at my local town meetings, been reading in letters from constituents, and what I have been told by the people of the Fourth Congressional District of Pennsylvania. I must also say that I agree with what the people I represent are saying.

Considerable savings could be made by cutting waste out of the Defense budget without hurting our ability to defend the Nation. The President has proposed a $35 billion increase in the Defense budget over the 1984 budget to total $272 billion in defense outlays for 1985. Our national defense problems cannot be solved by throwing money at them. Defense procurement can be improved, to prevent the well-publicized purchases of $100 dollar wrenches. Questionable weapons programs such as the MX missile and the rapid deployment force can be eliminated or delayed.

Foreign aid does not make much sense to the people of my district, where unemployment is still close to 15 percent. The President is proposing to increase foreign aid by $4 billion between 1984 and 1985 to bring our total foreign aid budget to $17.5 billion in 1985. Most of this increase is in military aid, and some of that goes to countries who have little regard for the human rights of their citizens.

Simplification of the tax system is something we all want. The President even mentioned it in his state of the Union address. In many ways, our current tax system is already simple, as it is understood, back home. Rich people simply do not pay taxes. Wealthy corporations simply do not pay taxes. The tax burden is placed simply on the backs of working people. I urge the responsible parties to simplify our tax system in a way which reflects a basic fairness which eliminates tax loopholes used by those who are the wealthiest among us.

Budget Director David Stockman told a congressional panel that the country was like a company in the 11th hour before bankruptcy. We cannot borrow to pay for excessive defense and foreign aid spending. We cannot borrow to make up for wealthy tax avoiders. We cannot borrow against the future of America.

DRUNK DRIVING/BANKRUPTCY

(Mr. REID asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, the tragedy is keenly and uniquely felt. Yet, in so many ways, duplicates thousands. Still another American family, one every 21 minutes, has lost a loved one in an alcohol-related automobile collision.

Drinking, driving, destruction.

We legislators have become acutely aware of our responsibility to treat this, the Nation's No. 1 violent crime, a crime that annually kills more than 25,000 people; injures 650,000 others, and causes at least $20 billion in property damage.

One effort to make people think twice about drinking and driving is H.R. 2380 which I am cosponsoring.

This bill closes the loopholes in the Bankruptcy Act which now permit debts incurred, as the result of an act of drunk driving, to be dischargeable in bankruptcy.

Our legislation not only would deter drunk driving but also would financially protect victims of the drunk driver.

H.R. 2380 is a sound, responsible commitment to America and I ask you to join me in supporting it.

THE GOOD NEWS AND THE BAD NEWS ON LEBANON

(Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, the President's announcement yesterday regarding Lebanon contains good news and bad news. The good news is that the President has finally recognized what many here in this body and across this country have been saying, that our mission in Lebanon was a mistake, that there was no peace to keep, and that our marines could not be successful as peacekeepers. It is news that comes late and a decision that comes late, but it is the right decision.

However, the bad news is that we still seem to be pursuing a mission without policy, a mission without clear support from the American people. What is the role of our troops, now removed to the ships offshore? And what is the mission of that armada?

Mr. Speaker, those are questions that ought to be addressed not merely by the President but by this Congress. I hope that we will return to those questions without delay. What are we doing in Lebanon? And where are we going?

CONFRONTATION AND ESCALATION REMAINS THE REAGAN POLICY ON LEBANON

(Mrs. COLLINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I think we are all relieved today knowing that our marines are being evacuated from the Beirut airport. But we cannot fool ourselves into thinking that they are safe and all is well.

It is not. If there is any pattern to Ronald Reagan's so-called foreign policy, it seems to be a preference for confrontation instead of negotiation. As Richard Cohen, in his excellent article in today's Washington Post, pointed out, there are too many similarities between Vietnam and Lebanon.

While we are expressing the need to remove our troops, Ronald Reagan appears to be escalating our military involvement. He has issued a statement speaking of "reconcentrating our forces" and plans to "vigorously accelerate the training, equipping, and support of the Lebanese Armed Forces." His arrogance is awesome. When will he realize that we cannot prop up a government that does not exist?

We must bring our bombs, our boats, and our boys home immediately.

AMERICAN SHIPPING INDUSTRY DEALT A BLOW BY BILL'S RECOMMITTAL

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, H.R. 2883 was recommitted to the Merchant Marine Committee, which had ordered it reported 30-10. This bill was designated as private legislation because it mentions a specific operator and specific ships. Yet, those of us who know the facts recognize that the bill would have benefited more than one operator.

It would have doubled our American-flag luxury cruise fleet;

It would have assured $10 million of work for American ship repair yards in the first year alone; and

It would have created 1,000 seagoing jobs a year for a labor force that is enduring 50 percent unemployment.

Instead of these significant results, let me tell you what recommitting the bill to committee will do:

With only two exceptions, all those "Love Boats" you will see or hear about will be foreign-flag ships;

With only two exceptions, Americans who take cruises will spend their money on vessels owned by foreign nationals and crewed by foreign seamen; and

With only two exceptions, the U.S. Treasury will continue to be denied tax revenues from the lucrative cruise industry.

I am disheartened that we begin another year no closer to a revitalized American cruise ship industry—an industry that has been dormant for decades. I am frustrated by this most recent turn of events, but I am not giving up hope. Things cannot get any worse.

DISABLED WORKERS LEGISLATION OPPOSED BY REAGAN ADMINISTRATION

(Mr. SHANNON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, once again the Reagan administration has shown its utter insensitivity to the needs of the disabled.

Yesterday, the Secretary of Health and Human Services made it clear to the Senate Finance Committee again that President Reagan opposes the disability legislation now pending in Congress.

The disability program is a national tragedy.

Since March 1981, nearly half a million disabled workers have had their lives seriously disrupted by the ongoing reviews; 190,000 beneficiaries have been cut from the rolls. Another 160,000 have kept their benefits only after a long appeal; 120,000 cases are currently pending.

All of us have heard from our constituents about the terrible cases of injustice which have occurred.

Half of the States have stopped processing cases, either on their own or because of a court order—and understandably so. They know, from firsthand experience, that the current rules are harsh and unfair, and that the entire disabled population will be living in fear and uncertainty until these problems are addressed.

Legislation to address this crisis is now waiting to go to the House floor. In response, the Reagan administration has worked to defeat this bill, and has threatened those States which have refused to process claims until reforms are made.

The Reagan administration's response is a disgrace, and I would strongly urge Members on both sides of the aisle to work for prompt action on this urgent legislation.

UPCOMING CWIP BILL OF PRIME IMPORTANCE TO CONSUMERS

(Mr. GEJDENSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, today the House will be addressing a bill on CWIP, construction work in progress. It is probably the most important utility issue that will face the Congress in this year.

If the present FERC regulations continue, they will allow major utilities around the country to prebill consumers for facilities that are not yet producing energy. This will give them a free ticket into the pockets of every consumer to make them pay for utilities they are not receiving. Senior citizens will pay for nuclear powerplants that have yet to produce electricity and may never do so in their lifetimes. It will stop utilities from the long and established practice of having to go to the free marketplace to decide whether or not it is necessary to build a utility facility, and we will no longer have that constraint on building. They will build more plants than we need, and the consumers will have to pay for them even if they are not completed.

Mr. Speaker, the debate today will be important to the future utility bills of our consumers in our districts, and they can jump astronomically if this legislation is not enacted.

THE LESSONS OF LEBANON

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, what have we learned in Lebanon?

I hope we have learned that we should be more careful before we declare some theater of war is central to our credibility on a global scale.

We should learn as well that even the power of a great nation is limited both by our resources and our ability to influence events. And we should learn that our power can be dissipated when we direct it to unattainable ends or apply it without caution.

□ 1600

A great power must use its power sparingly and effectively. If our bitter and tragic experience in Lebanon is to have any value, then let us leave that bloody spot with a better understanding of the real world and the real role we must play in this dangerous world today.

MANDELA FREEDOM RESOLUTION

(Mr. CROCKETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon, I introduced House Resolution 430, the Mandela freedom resolution. Joining me, as bipartisan original cosponsors, were my colleagues, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER), the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH), and the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH).

This resolution calls upon the Government of South Africa to immediately release Nelson and Winnie Mandela, black South African leaders who have been held in detention for more than 20 years for their opposition to South Africa's system of racial apartheid.

Nelson Mandela and his wife, Winnie, are freedom fighters in every sense of the words. They have labored long and hard, with considerable personal risk, to change the apartheid system in South Africa and to bring about a new South Africa where all its citizens will be treated equally under the law without regard to race or religion. Nelson Mandela has been imprisoned for over 20 years because of his leadership in the African National Congress which is widely regarded as the most important black South African political organization. Winnie Mandela, the "Sojourner Truth" of the antiapartheid movement, has been banned in her own country for over 20 years because of her role in founding the Black Parents Association.

Nelson and Winnie Mandela have endured serious hardship and many sacrifices as champions for human rights and fundamental political change in South Africa. They are in the great tradition of Raoul Wallenberg of Sweden and Lech Walesa of Poland's Solidarity labor movement—symbols of man's concern for his fellow man and universally accepted standards of justice and decency.

A dialog must be initiated between the white minority and black majority in South Africa if violence is to be avoided and peace achieved in that troubled country. The release of the Mandelas, in my opinion, is an essential element in the process of national reconciliation which is so long overdue.

I urge our colleagues to join with us in support of the Mandela freedom resolution and to demonstrate their solidarity with the aspirations for self-determination of the oppressed majority population in South Africa. As we observe Black History Month this February in the United States, let us take this opportunity to reaffirm our commitment to principles of freedom and democracy the world over and our deep concern for the peace and prosperity of the African people.

REDEPLOYMENT OF MARINES, THE FIRST STEP

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the President for his actions of yesterday in redeploying the marines in Lebanon. I am grateful for his leadership.

This morning I sent a letter of thanks to the President. In the letter I reminded the President that the next few days and weeks could be the most dangerous for our Lebanon mission. After all, the terrorists do not want us to leave. They want us to stay so that they can continue to shoot sitting ducks.

Therefore, the President must make sure that the marines are removed as quickly as their safety will permit.

Further, the President should realize that the marines are still targets and will also be at some risk onboard ship.

Frankly, the marines should be brought all the way home as soon as possible.

Thanks for the most important first step, Mr. President, but be careful. Now is not the time to forget. Now we must remember that terrorists love ducks, whether sitting or floating.

DEFER FUNDING FOR POTENTIALLY AWESOME BIOLOGICAL WEAPONS SYSTEM

(Mr. BEDELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, recently the Washington Post reported that a National Institutes of Public Health (NIH) advisory committee has approved a military project that is apparently intended to produce a vaccine against dysentery. While such a program may indeed serve to save the lives of millions of Third World children, I believe the Congress should pay heed to former Arms Control and Disarmament Agency Director Paul Warnke's advice and defer any funding intended for this program until such time as an arms-control-impact statement regarding this program is submitted to Congress. We must be absolutely certain that in approving funding for research against dysentery that we are not at the same time approving funding for the development of a potentially awesome biological weapons system.

Mr. Speaker, as amended in 1975, the Arms Control and Disarmament Act requires that the defense programs and analysis division of ACDA submit an arms-control-impact statement to Congress for any budgetary proposal that involves technology with potential military applications. In this regard, while I am greatly pleased that NIH is seeking actively a cure to one of the most deadly Third World diseases, I remain concerned that NIH is doing so in conjunction with the Defense Department and, fear that such experimentation could later be modified and used for the development of an indigenous U.S. biological warfare-fighting capability. For this reason, I sincerely hope that the appropriate committees of Congress will maintain the spirit of the law and request that ACDA complete an arms-control-impact statement with respect to this project.

FORMATION OF SPECIAL AD HOC COMMITTEE TO FREE MARTIN FELDSTEIN

(Mr. PEASE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, today, I would like to announce the formation of the Special Ad Hoc Committee To Free Martin Feldstein. Tentative board members include Paul Volcker, David Stockman, Murray Weidenbaum, Rudy Penner, Herbert Stein, PETE DOMENICI, and BOB DOLE, all of whom have impeccable conservative credentials and all of whom have agreed with Martin Feldstein that urgent action is needed now to reduce the enormous Federal deficits which the Reagan administration policies have brought the Nation.

Additional members of the steering committee are most welcome.

SPURIOUS INFORMATION ABOUT H.R. 555, CONSTRUCTION WORK IN PROGRESS POLICY ACT

(Mr. HARKIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, today, H.R. 555 will be on the floor; this is the "CWIP" bill. There has been a lot of misinformation floating around that somehow this is going to totally ban CWIP. It will not.

What it says is that to get CWIP, a utility would have to show about four things; that it acquires less than 40 percent of its construction funds from electric rate revenues. That means that it has a substantial construction project and the project is the least costly way to meet the electric needs of its consumers; third, that the company has to pay higher than average interest rates for borrowed money; and fourth, that it will not create anticompetitive effects for wholesale consumers.

I especially want to address my remarks to my fellow colleagues, who like I do, represent very rural areas in this country. There is a reason that the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association is in support of this bill. Those of us who represent farmers and small towns who get their power from the REC's will be put in dire consequences if H.R. 555 is not passed and if, in fact, we have to live with the FERC rule of last year. Because of the unique position of the REC's, they will be put in a bind, and if the FERC rule of last year is allowed to stand, the rural people of this country are going to pay higher and higher electric rates.

So I ask those of you who represent rural areas, please take a close look at this bill, contact your local REC's and see what they say about it.

GIVE THE PRESIDENT THE LINE-ITEM VETO

(Mr. PATTERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, the President said in his state of the Union speech that we must bring down the deficit to insure economic growth in this country. The President asked Congress to give him the line-item veto power; but he asked for it by constitutional amendment and we could not deliver that for about 6 years or so.

Each of the President's budgets, over the past 3 years, has been in excess of $180 billion in deficit; so I believe that the President is right. We should give him the line-item veto. We should do it today. We should do it now, by statute.

I do not know if it will do any good. I am not sure where he will line-item; but I would like to give him that privilege immediately.

Yesterday, I introduced H.R. 4774, the Line-Item Veto and Appropriations Act of 1984, and I ask my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to cosponsor my bill, which would give the President immediate power to eliminate or reduce spending in the 1984 budget. This will give the President the opportunity to demonstrate to the American people that he is willing to cut the budget deficit this year, and not wait until next year after the election.

My proposal, H.R. 4774, which grants the President enhanced rescission authority is based on the procedures set forth in the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, and works as follows: The President notifies Congress of his intention to eliminate or reduce an item in an appropriations bill. Congress then has 45 days to disapprove of the President's decision by enacting legislation to the contrary. If Congress fails to enact legislation, the President's decision stands, and the funds are eliminated or reduced. However, if Congress enacts legislation expressly disapproving of the President decision, the President will still have the opportunity as he does on all bills, to veto the enactment. Congress may then act to override the President's veto as prescribed by the Constitution.

One important note before I conclude. H.R. 4774, is only effective for 1 year from the date of enactment unless Congress, in its judgment, acts otherwise on or before the date of expiration.

In conclusion, let me stress the fact that this bill preserves the essential checks and balances between the legislative and executive branches of Government as was intended by the framers of our Constitution. I urge my colleagues support of this proposal with the hope of reducing the Federal Deficit through the administration's increased involvement and responsibility for the budget process.

BALANCED BUDGET CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of an amendment to require a balanced budget. The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request, I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships.

This request has been cleared by the minority leadership. I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Strange, there is not a word. Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. That should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of a balanced budget amendment: the Democratic leadership of this House.

MOVING THE MARINES OFFSHORE OF BEIRUT

(Mr. COUGHLIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, the President's decision to withdraw U.S. marines from the Beirut area to ships stationed offshore and to deter direct armed intervention by Syria in the Beirut area through naval and air support is one that deserves the support of Congress.

The mission of the United States in Lebanon has been twofold. The first mission was to provide a presence that would permit Israel to withdraw its forces to their present defensible position. That mission has been accomplished.

The second mission was to deter directed armed intervention by Syria in the Beirut area. Because such intervention would involve Syria moving heavy equipment, this could be detected and deterred through naval and air support without subjecting our forces onshore to attrition through death or injury.

ATTITUDES ON NUCLEAR WEAPONS

(Mr. WORTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, Samuel Johnson wrote that "events of history press upon the mind with the weight of truth."

I find it incredible that Mr. Neil Kinnock, the leader of Great Britain's Labour Party, has apparently failed to heed Samuel Johnson's prudent observation.

Mr. Kinnock today begins a week of meetings with Government leaders in our country. It would behoove America's leaders to remind him of British events which occurred four and one half decades ago.

Reading last Sunday's London Times, I was shocked to learn that, in recent days, when Mr. Kinnock met with a number of our colleagues visiting the House of Commons, he was asked by our distinguished colleague from California, BILL LOWERY, how, if he were Prime Minister, he would respond if, in Congressman LOWERY's words, "the Soviets lobbed a nuclear bomb into the heart of London."

According to the London Times account, Mr. Kinnock replied he would not retaliate.

The article further says that Mr. LOWERY told Mr. Kinnock if the United States failed to retaliate to a Soviet first strike, the failure would indicate "a total lack of will and resolve to defend ourselves."

Mr. Speaker, it is my firm conviction that Mr. Kinnock's naive attitude—if held by our President and free world partners who possess nuclear weapons—would tend to encourage a preemptive Soviet attack.

In my judgment, such a posture is dangerous to our collective efforts to deter nuclear war and to maintain peace through strength.

It is inconceivable that the leader of the British Labour Party has not benefited from the tragic lesson taught the late British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain.

How can Mr. Kinnock fail to recognize the devastating consequences of Chamberlain's appeasement?

Has Mr. Kinnock forgotten Chamberlain's acquiescence to Mussolini's conquest of Ethiopia?

Has Mr. Kinnock forgotten that Chamberlain signed the 1938 Munich Pact which recognized Hitler's territorial claims in Czechoslovakia? Can Mr. Kinnock forget that Chamberlain then promised "peace in our time," only to find his nation at war with the Axis Powers 1 year later?

Mr. Speaker, the inscription on the front of the National Archives carries the admonition that "Those who tend to forget history are doomed to repeat it."

I would hope Mr. Kinnock would consider this admonition.

How, we must ask Mr. Kinnock, can he ignore events of history which press upon the mind with the weight of truth?

EXCLUSION OF CHURCHES AND CHURCH SCHOOLS FROM SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. BURTON of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which would repeal mandatory inclusion of churches and church schools in the social security program.

Our country has a tradition of separation of church and state. This is a wise principle which has served our Nation well. Government regulation of religious organizations should be kept to an absolute minimum.

To tax churches may raise revenues, but it will also increase spending obligations with little net advantage.

The ministers with whom I have talked do not feel that the present law is good policy and I agree with them. I urge this Congress to listen to their voices.

The bill I am introducing today is a fair and reasonable alternative. I ask the Members to review and support this legislation.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

(Mr. SILJANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, at this time I had hoped to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of the voluntary school prayer constitutional amendment. The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request I must have the clearance of the majority and the minority leaderships.

This request has been cleared by the minority leadership. I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. That should make it very clear to all of the American people listening, who desire, as the slogan says above the Speaker's head, "In God We Trust," that our young people in our schools have the opportunity to pray at their free will.

It is interesting to couple along with this slogan behind the Speaker's head with the Supreme Court, the very institution who has repealed the opportunity to pray in schools, the daily invoking of the name of God, saying that "God should save our Nation." And I truly believe that that is one thing the Supreme Court has said that I can agree with, that God would certainly save our Nation.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER

(Mr. NIELSON of Utah asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, several surveys show between 75 and 80 percent of the American people favor restoring prayer to American schools. However, the Democratic liberal leadership of this House is holding the prayer amendment hostage. I ask you, Mr. Speaker: Is this not the people's House? Should not the people set the agenda for Congress?

I find it ironic that we began this session this afternoon with a prayer, yet the leadership is denying American schoolchildren the opportunity of doing the same thing.

Mr. Speaker, do not the children of this Nation deserve prayer as much as the Congress?

XIV OLYMPIC WINTER GAMES

(Mr. FIELDS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, today marks the opening ceremonies of the 14th winter Olympic games in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia.

One of the athletes representing us at those games is Scott Hamilton, an extraordinary young man from Bowling Green, Ohio.

Scott is the reigning U.S. and world figure skating champion and the overwhelming favorite to win a gold medal.

Yet, had it not been for the generosity of an anonymous financial supporter, the world would have never known of, or been able to appreciate, Scott's superb athletic talents.

We can only guess how many other gifted athletes, like Scott Hamilton, will, because of a lack of training funds, be watching the Olympics rather than participating in them.

Our Government is the only one in the world which does not financially support its Olympic movement. While I am not proposing direct Federal appropriations, there is a way to assist millions of amateur athletes in this Nation.

With that goal in mind, I, along with Congressmen RANGEL and VANDER JAGT introduced H.R. 1984, the Olympic Checkoff Act.

This bill would solve the financing problems facing the U.S. Olympic Committee, without any costs to the Federal Government, by allowing the American people to donate their money, through the use of the 1040, to our Olympic program.

H.R. 1984 has been cosponsored by 261 Members of the House and 59 Members of the other body. Yet, sadly this legislation languishes in the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I would urge all of our colleagues who believe in the promotion of amateur athletics in this country to contact the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to request action on H.R. 1984.

The Olympic Checkoff Act is as good as gold.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

(Mr. BILIRAKIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, we print "In God we trust" on our money, we sing "God Bless America" on holidays and we begin each day here in the House by acknowledging our Creator. It is an American tradition to be mindful of the first source of all our blessings of liberty.

It is a tradition that our courts have unfortunately sought to sever from the daily routine of children. Prayer in school does not represent a threat to the separation of church and state but rather is in keeping with the habits and beliefs of the framers of the Constitution who themselves began their work by asking God's guidance.

The American people want prayer back in schools. We in Congress must reflect their will by bringing a school prayer amendment to the floor.

FACING UP TO OUR DEFICIT BY A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT FOR A BALANCED BUDGET

(Mr. BROWN of Colorado asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this Congress has been unwilling to face up to the awesome problem of our deficits. That is no secret.

It is almost the height of irony that the criticism before this body of the executive's request to increase spending this year $70 billion has been that that increase is too small and not too large. What greater evidence do we need that this body is unwilling and unable to face up to its problems.

We must, if we are going to salvage this Nation's financial future, be willing to consider a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution or a limitation on spending. We must begin to consider that if we are to fulfill our responsibilities.

For Congress to refuse to even vote on that measure seems to me to be the height of irresponsibility. The people of this country deserve better.

Let us hope that the leadership will change their mind and allow the Members to vote on a constitutional amendment that limits our spending and balances the budget.

LINE-ITEM VETO CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

(Mr. HARTNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of the line-item veto constitutional amendment.

Now the Chair has ruled that in order to make this request, I must have the clearance of the majority and the minority leadership.

Mr. Speaker, this request has been cleared with the minority leadership. I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for that appropriate clearance.

I wonder if the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY) or the gentleman from New York might make that clearance for me.

Mr. Speaker, you know, it has been said by many that probably a line-item veto would do more to bring about a balanced budget than any other thing we could do here in this Congress.

I want to tell the American people, it should be clear to them, who stands in the way of a line-item veto to cut Federal spending, the Democratic leadership of this House.

RECOMMITTAL OF H.R. 2883—A SAD DAY INDEED

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW Mr. Speaker, Yesterday was a sad day indeed for the merchant marine industry when H.R. 2883, my bill to authorize the reflagging of two cruise ships, was recommitted to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Opponents have alleged that this bill would destroy the U.S. shipbuilding industry. Baloney!

Despite tax incentives for U.S. operators and despite construction subsidy programs, no such vessels have been constructed in the past 25 years.

This bill would actually encourage U.S. shipbuilding. The boats in my bill would develop the market of people who would like to cruise from U.S. port to U.S. port. And if it is successful, it will demonstrate to financiers that such operation is viable and will thus encourage their participation.

Aside from encouraging U.S. shipbuilding, there would be immediate tangible economic benefits: In direct jobs and revenues and thousands of dollars for merchants, suppliers, and tourist-related industries in various U.S. ports of call.

Incredibly, this bill would result in a doubling of the size of our merchant marine fleet.

I hope that the House will at some time in the future get the opportunity to debate and judge this issue on its merits.

A LOT MORE UNITY IS IN ORDER

(Mr. RITTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the U.S. marines are out of their sitting duck positions at Beirut. I personally wanted to see them come out at the right time. I just felt we should not be telling our adversaries just what that time would be.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the recent dramatic increase in violence in Beirut was not stimulated by partisan political voices but the facts, the chronology of events, do tell us otherwise.

In yesterday's Washington Post, one notes that a relative silence in Beirut, a lull in the fighting between December 4 and February 2, events moved swiftly:

Feb. 2: Heavy fighting erupts between Lebanese army and Shiite militiamen in suburbs of Beirut.

Feb. 3-4: Moslem Shiite leader calls for resignation of Moslem cabinet leaders and urges Moslems in the army not to follow orders of commanders. Prime Minister Wazzan submits resignation of cabinet.

Feb. 6: Moslem and Druze militiamen seize much of Beirut, demand Gemayel's resignation.

Feb. 7: Reagan announces decision to redeploy Marines from Beirut to ships offshore.

My colleagues, that corresponds precisely with a resolution moving through the Democratic party, through the Democratic Caucus and through the Foreign Affairs Committee and poised to move through this House. When our adversaries see us as a House divided, that is when they strike. Or is the total correspondence between the movement of the partisan resolution and the dramatic increase in violence only a coincidence?

A lot more unity is in order.

LINE-ITEM VETO POWER FOR ALL FUTURE PRESIDENTS

(Mr. MACK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, while at this time I do not intend to ask for a unanimous-consent request, I do want to talk about the line-item veto.

There are many who seem to be opposed to the line-item veto because it seems to be presented with the idea that is a panacea to our spending problems.

We realize it is not, but we are saying that we think it is one more weapon in the arsenal to cut spending. There are many people who say that the line-item veto should be opposed because it gives dictatorial power to the President.

Well, I think the States, 43 whose Governors have the opportunity to have that power, certainly indicate that is not the case. It is not dictatorial power.

There are many who surprisingly oppose it because it might become a weapon for the President of the United States, Ronald Reagan. But let me add, we are planning to give this power to all future Presidents.

So I would hope since the Congress apparently is not going to take its responsibility, that we ought to give this additional weapon to the President so he could carry out his responsibilities.

BY THEIR JET TRAILS YOU SHALL KNOW THEM

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago we voted on the adjournment resolution. We voted to leave town for a week and leave our legislative business behind.

We will leave behind proposals to balance the budget, approve a line-item veto, fight crime, reform taxes, and permit children to pray in schools.

Is that what the American people think we ought to be doing? Leaving this agenda behind as we clear out of town?

We hear a lot of talk on this floor about the Nation's problems but there seems to be very little willingness to stay here and do something of value about those problems.

My guess is that some weeks from now we will be told that many of the legislative items supported by a vast majority of the American people cannot be considered because we do not have the time.

Now we do have the time. Now we could act. But in voting to adjourn we refused to do so.

The American people may be interested in who voted how on that adjournment resolution.

Well, Republicans voted by better than a 2-to-1 margin to stay in town and do the country's work. By a 9-to-1 margin, Democrats voted to leave our work behind.

Mr. Speaker, "By their jet trails you shall know them."

ON COSPONSORING HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 404

(Mr. COURTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. COURTER. I thank the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the comments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and also the gentleman from Florida who just spoke about the importance of passing a line-item veto so that we can finally give this President some tools to do the job.

During this year 1984 we will, and the members of the public will, be listening to Members of Congress, the Senate, the House of Representatives, lots of people talking and deploring the fact that the deficit is large and sometimes out of control.

I think it is important for those individuals and citizens that listen to that that they turn around and ask the question, those who proffer and complain about a large deficit as to whether they have cosponsored House Joint Resolution 404, whether they have basically put on the line the important thing, whether they will vote and stand up with the majority of the American people and give this President and all future Presidents the right to a line-item veto.

I live, obviously, in the State of New Jersey. Our Governor has that right. We have had a balanced budget in New Jersey year after year after year.

Indeed, 43 Governors in the United States of America have the power of a line-item veto. It is about time that the Governors and the people in the various States give this Congress the message: We need a line-item veto.

We must get control of spending and balance the budget, finally.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

LET US MAINTAIN INSTITUTIONAL INTEGRITY IN THE HOUSE

(Mr. LUNGREN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, Sunday's New York Times carried a story about Presidential politics. In that story, someone described as one of the Speaker's associates had this to say about the Speaker's recent endorsement of Jimmy Carter's Vice President: "Every punch we take is one less Fritz has to take." The Speaker sees himself as the person who carries the fight, who can be punching away at Reagan while Fritz carries the banner.

While many Democrats may applaud the Speaker's action, I really wonder if his new role as a prize fighter is what the House and the Nation need at this time.

Do we really need a Speaker who sees himself as a boxer, giving and taking punches? Is Fritz Mondale so frail that he needs someone to stand in there and fight for him? Will this House be turned into Madison Square Garden with the Speaker as the main event?

Mr. Speaker, please let Fritz fight his own fight. We need you to provide some sort of institutional integrity for all of us. We will not get it if you are always looking for a fight or if you are taking too many punches.

SPEAKER'S ENDORSEMENT OF WALTER MONDALE

(Mr. HUNTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, in the speech announcing his endorsement of Walter Mondale the Speaker said:

Thirty-two years I have been here and never have I been as afraid of a cold war as I am today. We need to turn the world toward peace and away from war.

I applaud the Speaker's goals, if not the way he seeks to go about achieving these goals.

Senators JOHN GLENN and ERNEST HOLLINGS who are both good Democrats and Presidential candidates chided Mr. Mondale on his opposition to a whole series of weapons systems that they believe are needed to preserve the peace.

This is what Senator GLENN had to say last November. I quote:

I support the development and deployment of the B-1 bomber. Fritz Mondale opposes it. I support the development and deployment of a new Nimitz class aircraft carrier. Fritz Mondale opposes it. He voted to reduce U.S. troops in Europe by 50 percent.

Senator GLENN, will you please call the Speaker.

THE FEDERAL DEFICIT

(Mr. DORGAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the admonitions of the minority side about the Federal deficit. They say they want a line-item veto, and they want to change the U.S. Constitution.

I hope they understand that changing the Constitution is not going to change the deficit. You have to change the budget to change the deficit. I am certainly willing to vote for a change in the budget if you are, but we ought to call the White House if we want to change the budget. The administration has proposed a budget calling for $180 billion in Federal deficits.

There is not an arithmetic book in this country that says you can increase military spending by $100 billion and at the same time tell the American people they will not have to pay additional taxes. That is a recipe for big budget deficits

If the President wants to spend more money, then he must ask the American people to pay for it. If he is not willing to do that, we are going to experience big Federal deficits, No matter what the Constitution says.

Our Federal deficit is not a Republican or Democrat deficit. The deficit is an American deficit and it is an American problem, and this Congress and this President had better get about the business of bringing it under control.

SPENDING STARTS IN THE HOUSE

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, talk was just made about nonsense. Let me say that any Member of the House whose party has been in control of this House since I was 11 years old is ill suited to address the White House and blame it for a budget which is ultimately based on laws this House passes.

Every tax we raise is raised starting in this House. Every bill we spend starts in this House. The so-called uncontrollables are controlled by this House. And the gentleman's majority party just voted 9 to 1 to leave and will later on this year tell us that we do not have time to do what we ought to do.

Now, if we are going to get serious, that would mean that the majority leader would have to be less partisan in his Press Club speeches, it would mean the Speaker would have to be less partisan in throwing punches for Fritz, and if we are going to talk about partisanship, we would be delighted to have a joint schedule to routinely and methodically organize things.

But if somebody who, as I said, was 11 when the gentleman's party took control and who was 9 when the Speaker was elected to this House, I hardly feel that we are responsible for the deficits the gentleman's party created.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 1388) to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase the rates of compensation for disabled veterans and the rates of dependency and indemnity compensation for survivors, to increase rates of compensation for certain blinded veterans, to modify the periods during which certain temporary increases in compensation are paid, to provide for continuation of compensation pending the administrative appeal of certain reductions or discontinuances, to make certain improvements in the Veterans' Administration home loan guaranty program, to repeal the 1989 termination date of the Vietnam-era GI bill, and to make certain improvements in other veterans' programs; to express the sense of the Congress that increases in compensation should take effect on December 1 beginning in fiscal year 1985, and to establish a pilot project to expedite certain medical facility construction projects; and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

"(1) with respect to deaths and disabilities resulting from diseases or injuries incurred or aggravated after September 30, 1982, shall take effect as of October 1, 1982; and

"(2) with respect to deaths and disabilities resulting from diseases or injuries incurred or aggravated before October 1, 1982, shall take effect as of October 1, 1983.".

PILOT PROGRAM FOR EXPEDITING CERTAIN MEDICAL FACILITY CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS

SEC. 211. (a)(1) Subject to subsection (b) and notwithstanding any other provision of law, during fiscal years 1984 and 1985 the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may obligate, for the purpose described in paragraph (2), a total of not more than $25,000,000 of funds appropriated to the Veterans' Administration under the appropriation account "CONSTRUCTION, MAJOR PROJECTS" that are unobligated and that the Administrator determines are no longer needed for the projects for which such funds were appropriated and are not needed for contingencies arising in the Veterans' Administration's construction program.

(2) Funds described in paragraph (1) may be obligated for the purpose of undertaking during fiscal year 1984 or 1985 working drawings for any project for construction or alteration of any medical facility that is planned to be undertaken (subject to appropriations for such project) during fiscal year 1985 or 1986.

(b)(1) Funds may not be obligated under subsection (a) for working drawings for projects for the complete replacement of an existing health-care facility or for projects for the new construction of a complete health-care facility.

(2) The amount obligated under subsection (a) for working drawings for any one project may not exceed $2,500,000.

(3) The Administrator may not undertake under subsection (a) working drawings for a project unless the Administrator, not less than 30 days before undertaking the drawings, has provided to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs and on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives written notice of the drawings to be undertaken, the estimated cost of the drawings, and the estimated range of the total cost of the project.

(c) For the purpose of this section:

(1) The term "medical facility" has the meaning provided in section 5001(3) of title 38, United States Code.

(2) The term "working drawings" includes specifications and other related technical services.

SEC. 212. The land comprising the Confederate cemetery at Springfield, Missouri, shall be considered part of the Springfield National Cemetery and may be used for the purposes for which national cemeteries may be used under chapter 24 of title 38, United States Code. The provisions of the first section of the Act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. 1077, chapter 211) requiring that the land comprising that cemetery be used only as a cemetery for the graves of men who were in the military or naval service of the Confederate States of America is hereby superseded.

(1) Section 351 is amended by striking out "title 28, United States Code," both places it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "title 28".

(2) Section 412(a) is amended—

(B) by striking out "section 402 of title 42" in clause (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "section 202 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 402)"; and

(C) by striking out "subchapter II of chapter 7 of title 42" in the matter after clause (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "title II of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 201 et seq.)"; and

(3) Section 3010(m) is amended by striking out "subsection" and inserting in lieu thereof "section".

Mr. MONTGOMERY (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask our distinguished chairman to explain to us what his amendments are.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman knows, on October 25, 1983, the House passed H.R. 4169, the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1983. Included in that bill were the provisions of H.R. 2937, a bill reported earlier by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs to provide a 4.1-percent cost-of-living increase in compensation for our service-connected veterans and their widows effective April 1, 1984. In November, the other body passed its 3.5-percent bill with the same April 1 effective date. Also, during the first session of this Congress, the House passed two veterans bills, H.R. 2936 to increase the membership of the Board of Veterans' Appeals from 50 to 65 members and H.R. 2948 affecting the VA's home loan guaranty program.

In November, the other body passed its 3.5-percent bill with the same April 1 effective date. We have been working with the other body since November to resolve the differences in the two bills. They have accepted many of our provisions and the compromise agreement I bring to you today is a good one.

Last year the President's budget requested a 6-month delay in cost-of-living increases for all Federal beneficiaries. During our committee hearing on the VA's budget, representatives of the major veterans' organizations expressed their views on the delayed increase. It was their unanimous position that they would not oppose the deferral with the caveat that if any exceptions were to be made for any group, disabled veterans should be considered first. The organizations repeated their position statement during subsequent hearings on compensation legislation. One witness probably stated it best. He said that veterans had always served their country and if the delayed COLA would help to bring the huge deficits under control, they would continue to do their part.

At the time we reported H.R. 2937, the first concurrent budget resolution had been approved by the House and was pending in the Senate. That resolution included funds for a 4.1-percent increase which was the amount estimated at that time by the Congressional Budget Office to be the factor required to keep pace with the rate of inflation. Subsequently, those estimates were revised and the finally adopted first concurrent budget resolution was based on a 3.5-percent inflation factor which forms the basis for the proposed amendments we are considering today. The compromise agreement also contains another significant provision—a sense of the Congress policy statement that future increases in rates of disability compensation and DIC shall take effect on December 1, 1984, and on December 1 of each fiscal year thereafter.

The cost-of-living increase provided by the proposed amendments is necessary since these benefits are not indexed by law. This adjustment simply keeps pace with the rise in the Consumer Price Index since the last cost-of-living increase that became effective October 1, 1982. The rate increase will benefit almost 2.3 million service-connected disabled veterans and approximately 319,000 widows and children of veterans who have died in service-incurred disease or injury.

In addition to the cost-of-living increase, the proposed amendments contain provisions which would provide additional benefits to certain blinded veterans who also have service-connected hearing loss. We feel this increased compensation is warranted because the loss of hearing has a far greater impact on a blinded veteran's mobility than such loss would have on an individual who has not lost his or her sight. A blinded person relies on the direction of sound in walking and moving around. If the defective hearing impairs a person's ability to detect the direction of a noisy hazard, he or she does not know which way to turn to avoid the peril.

The proposed amendments provides eligibility for VA benefits to a senior ROTC member who is injured in summer camp for such injuries which were suffered prior to October 1, 1982. Present law covers benefits for injuries sustained on or after that date and the committees feel that all such ROTC members should be eligible as veterans, without regard to the time of injury.

The proposed amendments provides eligibility to Veterans' Administration benefits to a child adopted by a veteran, regardless of age at adoption, who became helpless prior to age 18, provided the child was a member of the veteran's household at age 18.

The bill approved by the other body would add dysthymic disorder—depressive neurosis—to the list of diseases of certain former prisoners of war that are presumed to be service connected. Because the House committee feels that depressive neurosis is one of the anxiety states that were added by Public Law 97-37, we are accepting the proposal of the other body to clarify the intent of Congress that this disability should be included on the list of diseases of certain former prisoners of war that are presumed to be service connected.

Last May, the House passed H.R. 2936 by a vote of 423 to 2 to give the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs discretionary authority to expand the Board of Veterans' Appeals from 50 to 65 members in order to improve the timeliness in processing appeals from veterans. The Senate bill contained essentially the same provisions and I am happy to say that the compromise agreement we bring to you today not only gives permanent authority for 65 members of the Board of Veterans' Appeals but also gives the Administrator flexibility to assign temporary or acting members to the Board to reduce what is now an unacceptable backlog of appeals.

Finally, let me speak briefly to that provision of the Senate bill that would repeal the December 31, 1989, termination date for the current Vietnam-era GI bill program. This is the second or third time the other body has attempted to repeal the termination date. Each time the House has flatly refused the provision. As the gentleman knows, with his concurrence, this provision is not contained in the compromise we worked out with the other body. I will not take the time of the House to go into all of the reasons why we opposed this provision, I have made my position known on this matter many times before. Hopefully, we have put this issue to rest and the message I want sent to the Office of the Secretary of Defense is that we are not going to agree to any extension of this date.

The House committee has on two occasions reported H.R. 1400 without dissenting votes. This bill would provide for a new GI education program to enhance the recruitment and retention of military personnel for all branches of the service. In addition, it would provide entitlement for those who make an obligation to serve in the Active Reserve and National Guard. If there is going to be an education program for those now serving in the military beyond fiscal year 1989, then H.R. 1400 will have to be enacted. We have no plan now or in the future to extend the current 1989 termination for the current Vietnam-era GI bill program.

I can also assure the gentleman the cost of our compromise with the other body is within the amounts contained in the first concurrent budget resolution. I appreciate the gentleman's help in getting this agreement with the other body. By doing so, our disabled veterans should be receiving their increased benefits for April in their May 1 checks.

There follows a more detailed explanation of the provisions passed by the Senate, the House amendments and the proposed agreement:

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF HOUSE BILL (H.R. 4169), SENATE BILL (S. 1388), AND COMPROMISE AGREEMENT ON S. 1388, THE VETERANS' COMPENSATION AND PROGRAM IMPROVEMENTS AMENDMENTS OF 1984

This document explains the provisions of title IV of H.R. 4169 as passed by the House of Representatives (hereinafter referred to as the "House bill"), the provisions of S. 1388 as passed by the Senate (hereinafter referred to as the "Senate bill"), and the provisions of a compromise on S. 1388 as agreed to by the Veterans' Affairs Committees of the House and Senate. The differences between the Houe bill, the Senate bill, and the compromise agreement are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by agreements reached between the Committees, and minor drafting, technical, and clarifying changes.

TITLE I—DISABILITY COMPENSATION AND DEPENDENCY AND INDEMNITY COMPENSATION

Part A—Rate increases

Disability Compensation

Both the House bill (sections 402 through 404) and the Senate bill (sections 101 through 103) would amend chapter 11 of title 38, United States Code, to increase, effective April 1, 1984, the basic rates of service-connected disability compensation for veterans, the rates payable for certain severe disabilities, the dependents allowances payable to veterans rated 30-percent or more disabled, and the annual clothing allowance for certain disabled veterans. The House bill would increase such rates and allowances by 4.1 percent and the Senate bill by 3.5 percent. Under both bills, the increases are rounded to the nearest dollar.

The compromise agreement (sections 101 through 103) follows the Senate bill.

Dependency and Indemnity Compensation

Both the House bill (sections 405 through 407) and the Senate bill (sections 104 through 106) would amend chapter 13 of title 38 to increase, effective April 1, 1984, rates of dependency and indemnity compensation (DIC) payable to the surviving spouses and children of veterans whose deaths were service connected. The House bill would increase such rates by 4.1 percent and the Senate bill by 3.5 percent, with the increases in both bills rounded to the nearest dollar.

The compromise agreement (sections 104 through 106) follows the Senate bill.

The Senate bill (section 104(e)), but not the House bill, would specify that—for the purposes of section 156(e)(1)(A) of Public Law 97-377, relating to increases in benefits paid to replace, for the survivors of those who died on active duty or from service-connected causes, certain social security survivors' benefits terminated by section 2205 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-35)—the overall average of the percentages by which each of the DIC rates set forth in present section 411 of title 38 is increased shall be considered to be 3.5 percent. Section 156(a) of Public Law 97-377 provides that the benefits thereby restored are to be increased, effective on the same date as section 411 DIC increases, "by a percentage that is equal to the overall average of" those increases (rounded to the nearest tenth of a percent). Hence, the effect of this provision would be to ensure that the increase in the replacement benefit for each of those survivors, effective April 1, 1984 is 3.5 percent.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

However, the Committees note that the Senate provision expresses the Committees' intention regarding the rate for the COLA for these benefits that would, upon enactment of the compromise agreement, take effect on April 1, 1984 (by virtue of Public Law 97-377), and that the VA has advised that it intends to provide a 3.5-percent increase in these benefits.

Effective Date of Future Increases

The Senate bill (section 107), but not the House bill, would express the sense of the Congress that future increases in rates of disability compensation and DIC shall take effect on December 1 of the fiscal year involved and that the budget for each such fiscal year include amounts necessary to achieve that purpose.

The compromise agreement (section 107) contains this provision.

The Committees note their understanding that, in section 1(b)(15) of the Congressional budget for fiscal year 1984 (H. Con. Res. 91), provision is made, in the totals for Function 700, "Veterans' Benefits and Services", for fiscal years 1985 and 1986, for compensation and DIC increases to be enacted effective December 1 of each of those fiscal years. Section 107 of the compromise agreement is intended as a formal declaration of Congressional policy as to the date on which future increases shall take effect.

Part B—Compensation Program Amendments

Presumption Concerning Dysthymic Disorder

The Senate bill (section 111), but not the House bill, would amend section 312(b) of title 38 to provide, effective October 1, 1983, for the inclusion of dysthymic disorder (or depressive neurosis) in the list of diseases of certain former prisoners of war that are presumed to be service connected.

The compromise agreement (section 111) contains this provision.

Rates of Compensation for Certain Blinded Veterans

Both the House bill (section 411) and the Senate bill (section 112) would amend, effective October 1, 1983, provisions of subsections (o) and (p) of section 314 of title 38 that govern the rates of special monthly compensation payable to certain veterans who suffer from service-connected blindness in combination with a hearing loss that is service connected in at least one ear.

Under current law, veterans who suffer from blindness with "visual acuity of 5/200 or less" (meaning vision no better than 5/200) combined with bilateral deafness (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service-connected) rated at 60-percent-or-more disabling are entitled to the payment of disability compensation at the rate prescribed by subsection (o) of section 314. The Senate bill, but not the House bill, would reduce from 60 percent to 40 percent the minimum degree of disability for bilateral deafness required to qualify for the subsection (o) rating. The House bill, but not the Senate bill, would establish an additional category of veterans entitled to the subsection (o) rating, those who suffer from blindness with "only light perception or less" (meaning vision with light perception only or with no light perception) combined with deafness rated from 10- through 40-percent disabling (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service connected).

The compromise agreement (sections 112(a)) would establish an additional category of veterans entitled to the subsection (o) rating, those who suffer from blindness with only light perception or less combined with either bilateral deafness rated at 40-percent-or-more disabling (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service connected) or total service-connected deafness in one ear.

Under current law, veterans who suffer from blindness with visual acuity of 5/200 or less combined with deafness (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service connected) rated at 40-percent disabling are entitled, by virture of subsection (p) of section 314, to the next higher rate of compensation (a "full-step" increase) above the otherwise applicable rate based on the condition of blindness only. These otherwise applicable rates are prescribed in subsection (l) of section 314 for blindness with visual acuity of 5/200 or less but with more than light perception, in subsection (m) for blindness with only light perception, and in subsection (n) for blindness without light perception. In both the House and Senate bills, the degree of disability for deafness combined with blindness required for the full-step increase would be reduced to 30 percent. In addition, the Senate bill, but not the House bill, would provide a full-step increase, instead of compensation at the next intermediate rate (a "half-step" increase), to those who suffer from blindness with visual acuity of 5/200 or less combined with service-connected total deafness in one ear.

The compromise agreement (section 112 (b)(1)) would expand the category of veterans with visual acuity of 5/200 or less who receive a full-step increase, currently consisting of those with deafness rated at 40-percent disabling, to include those with deafness rated at 30-percent disabling.

Under current law, veterans who suffer from blindness with 5/200 visual acuity or less combined with service-connected total deafness in one ear are entitled, by virtue of subsection (p) of section 314, to a half-step increase. Neither the House bill nor the Senate bill would modify the half-step-increase provision itself. However, the House bill, but not the Senate bill, would, as noted above in the discussion of the subsection (o) rating, reduce the requirements for the subsection (o) rating to include blindness with only light perception or less combined with certain deafness rated at 10-percent-or-more disabling. Since service-connected total deafness in one ear is rated as 10-percent disabling, the House bill, but not the Senate bill, would, therefore, grant the subsection (o) rating to certain veterans who currently benefit from a half-step increase. Such veterans are those who suffer from blindness with light perception only combined with service-connected total deafness in one ear and those who suffer from blindness without light perception combined with such deafness. Also, the Senate bill, but not the House bill, would provide a full-step increase to all those who, under current law, receive a half-step increase.

The compromise agreement (section 112(b)(2)), in the cases of veterans who suffer from blindness having only light perception or less, would expand the scope of the half-step-increase deafness criterion, currently service-connected total deafness in one ear, to include those who have bilateral deafness rated at 10- or 20-percent disabling (with hearing impairment in at least one ear being service connected).

The following chart illustrates the differences in disability ratings for combinations of hearing and vision impairments under current law, the House bill, the Senate bill, and the compromise agreement:

[1] House bill.
[2] Senate bill.
[3] Compromise agreement.
[4] No change from current law.

The Senate bill (section 112(c)), but not the House bill would require the Administrator to conduct a study of the appropriateness of the correlations between degrees of deafness (including deafness combined with other diseases) and the rates of disability compensation paid by the VA and, not later than one year following the date of enactment, to submit to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Senate a report on the results of the study together with the Administrator's recommendations for legislative or administrative action.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

The Committees note that, under section 355 of title 38, the Administrator is charged with adopting and applying a schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity resulting from specific injuries. The Administrator is also charged with adjusting the schedule from time to time in accordance with experience.

In a letter dated January 10, 1984, to the Chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, the Administrator noted that the VA is currently exploring the medical and benefits aspects of hearing loss, and is considering a study of the current state of the art with regard to treatment and prosthetic devices for the hearing disabled.

The Committees direct the Administrator to provide for the conduct of a study, pursuant to the provisions of section 355, of the rating schedule with respect to the varying degrees of hearing loss (considered both alone and in combination with other disabilities) suffered by veterans. Particular attention should be given to the methods for conducting the medical evaluations upon which hearing-loss ratings are based.

The Committees further direct the Administrator to submit to them, not later than April 1, 1985, a report on the results of this study. The report should include a discussion of any plans or recommendations for administrative or legislative action that the Administrator considers appropriate with respect to VA programs for hearing-impaired veterans. The report should also include descriptions of the various methods currently used in the VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery and Department of Veterans' Benefits and outside the VA for measuring hearing loss and the extent to which such methods accurately and realistically measure the hearing loss that hearing-disabled persons experience in varied real-life situations, such as those that occur in the workplace, in school, at home, in public places, and in open spaces, and should set forth any plans or recommendations for changes in such VA methods that the Administrator may consider appropriate based on the study results. The Committees believe that the completion of the hearing-impairment study described above and the submission of a report on it, as directed, will remove the need for a statutory provision.

Increases in Compensation on Account of Certain Periods of Hospitalization or Convalescence

Both the House bill (section 408) and the Senate bill (section 113) would amend chapter 51 of title 38 to modify, effective October 1, 1983, the period during which the compensation paid to a service-connected disabled veteran rated less than 100-percent disabled is temporarily increased to the 100-percent rate on account of the veteran's hospitalization for a period in excess of 21 days for a service-connected disability or for hospital treatment followed by convalescence for such a disability. Under current law, the period for which payment is made begins on the first day of the month following the month in which the hospital care begins and it ends on the last day of the month in which the hospitalization or convalescence ends. The House bill would modify this period so that it would begin on the first day of such hospital care. (This was the status of the law prior to enactment of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982 (Public Law 97-253).) The Senate bill would modify the period for which payment is made so that it would begin on the first day of hospital care and continue only until the day on which the hospitalization or convalescence ends.

The compromise agreement (section 113) would provide, effective October 1, 1983, that, when a period of hospital care in excess of 21 days for a service-connected disability occurs entirely within a single month, the period for which payment of increased compensation on account of such care is made would commence on the first day of that month. This provision, in conjunction with present section 3012(b)(8), which provides that the period of payment ends on the last day of the month in which the care terminates, would have the effect of making the period of payment in such cases the entire month in which the care was furnished.

The Committees note that, under the compromise agreement, veterans whose service-connected hospital care lasts for more than 21 days but does not carry over into a second calendar month would receive the same benefit—one full month of compensation at the 100-percent rate—as is received under current law by those whose care is of the same duration but happens to extend into a second calendar month.

Continuation of Compensation Pending Review and Appeal

The Senate bill (section 114), but not the House bill, would amend chapter 53 of title 38 to provide for the continued payment of disability compensation at the 100-percent rate pending review and appeal (and subject to repayment if the veteran loses on appeal) of a determination made after March 31, 1984, to reduce or discontinue such compensation as the result of a change in the service-connected or employability status or physical condition of a veteran whose disability had, prior to that determination, been rated as total for at least 10 years and who, within 30 days after that determination, files a statement of disagreement and requests continued payment.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

TITLE II—VETERANS' PROGRAM IMPROVEMENTS

Inclusion of Certain Adopted Persons Within the Title 38 Definition of Child

The House bill (section 410), but not the Senate bill, would amend section 101(4) of title 38, effective October 1, 1983, to expand the definition of "child" for purposes of general eligibility for Veterans' Administration benefits so as to include a veteran's adopted child even though the child was age 18 or over at the time of adoption as long as (1) the child had become permanently incapable of self-support prior to reaching age 18, and (2) was a member of the veteran's household at age 18. Under the VA's interpretation of current law, a veteran's adopted child who became permanently incapable of self-support before turning 18 is considered as meeting the definition only if the adoption occurred before the child reached age 18.

The compromise agreement (section 201) contains this provision.

Five-Year Extension of Program to Provide Assistance to State Veterans' Cemeteries

The Senate bill (section 201) and section 5 of H.R. 2948 as passed by the House on May 24, 1983 (hereinafter referred to as H.R. 2948), would amend section 1008(a)(2) of title 38 to authorize the appropriation of such sums as are necessary for fiscal years 1985 through 1989 for matching-fund grants to States for establishing, expanding, or improving State veterans' cemeteries.

The compromise agreement (section 202) contains this provision.

Miscellaneous Education Program Amendments

Repeal of 1989 Termination Date for Vietnam Era GI Bill.—The Senate bill (section 202), but not the House bill, would amend section 1662(b) of title 38 to repeal the December 31, 1989, termination date for the current, Vietnam-era GI Bill and provide for reimbursement to the VA by the Department of Defense for all amounts of Vietnam-era GI Bill benefits paid by the VA after December 31, 1989.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

Authority for Advanced Payment of Educational Assistance.—The House bill (section 421), but not the Senate bill, would amend section 1780(d) and various cross-references in chapters 31 and 36 of title 38 to terminate, effective October 1, 1983, the VA's making of advance payments of educational assistance to certain veterans and dependents enrolled in programs of education.

The compromise agreement does not contain these provisions.

Other Education Program Amendments.—The Senate bill (section 203), but not the House bill, would amend chapters 34, 35, and 36 of title 38 to make a series of amendments relating to VA-administered educational assistance programs to (1) allow certain individuals who, despite having post-December 31, 1976, active-duty service that would make them eligible for the Post-Vietnam Era Educational Assistance program (VEAP) (chapter 32), are not eligible for VEAP because they have Vietnam-era GI Bill eligibility (under chapter 34) by virtue of certain pre-1977 training duty to elect to participate in VEAP in lieu of receiving GI Bill benefits; (2) conform the level of survivors' educational assistance benefits (under chapter 35) for entitlement-free pursuit of high-school training to the level of Vietnam-era veterans' GI Bill benefits for such training; (3) bar concurrent receipt of benefits under more than one VA-administered educational assistance program for pursuit of one program of education; and (4) expand the coverage of the 48-month maximum limitation on total educational assistance benefits to include certain recently-enacted programs administered by the VA.

The compromise agreement (section 203) contains these provisions.

Substitution of Housing Loan-Guaranty Entitlement

The Senate bill (section 204) and section 4 of H.R. 2948 would amend section 1802(b)(2) of title 38 to permit, effective on the date of enactment, substitution of a veteran's home-loan guaranty entitlement when a veteran-transferee is not an immediate transferee.

The compromise agreement (section 204) contains this provision.

Loan Guaranties for Manufactured Homes Permanently Affixed to Lots

The Senate bill (section 205) and section 3 of H.R. 2948 would amend chapter 37 of title 38 to provide, effective on the date of enactment, for the guaranty of a loan to a veteran for the purchase of a manufactured home (or the refinancing of a loan previously made for the purchase of a manufactured home) on the same terms and conditions as a loan for a conventionally-built home if two criteria are met: First, the manufactured home is or will be permanently affixed to a lot owned or being purchased by the veteran; and, second, as so affixed, the home is regarded as real property under the laws of the State in which the home is located.

The compromise agreement (section 205) contains this provision.

Employment Emphasis Under Federal Contracts for Veterans with Serious Employment Handicaps

The Senate bill (section 206), but not the House bill, would amend section 2011 of title 38 to expand, effective on the date of enactment, the definition of "special disabled veteran" for the purposes of certain employment and training initiatives under chapters 41 and 42 of title 38 to include a veteran with a service-connected disability rated at 10- or 20-percent disabling if the veteran has been determined to have a serious employment handicap under the VA's rehabilitation program for service-connected disabled veterans carried out pursuant to chapter 31 of title 38.

The compromise agreement (section 206) contains this provision.

Payments for Fiduciary Services

The Senate bill (section 207), but not the House bill, would amend section 3202(a) of title 38 to authorize, effective on the date of enactment, the VA to permit VA-appointed fiduciaries to deduct from beneficiaries' estates certain limited commissions for fiduciary services where the Administrator determines such commissions are necessary in order to obtain fiduciary services that are in the best interests of the beneficiaries and where the fiduciaries receive no other remuneration for their services.

The compromise agreement (section 207) contains this provision.

Board of Veterans' Appeals Membership

The Senate bill (section 211) and subsection (a) of H.R. 2936 as passed by the House on May 17, 1983 (hereinafter referred to as H.R. 2936), would amend present section 4001(a) of title 38 to authorize an expansion—from 50 to 65—in the maximum number of members of the Board of Veteran' Appeals.

The compromise agreement (section 208) contains this provision.

The Senate bill (section 211) and subsection (c) of H.R. 2936 contain provisions that would amend section 4001 and 4002 of title 38 to make a technical amendment to delete the word "associate" from the statutory description of members of the Board.

The compromise agreement (section 208) contains these provisions.

The Senate bill (section 211) and subsection (b) of H.R. 2936 would further amend section 4001 to authorize the appointment of individuals to serve as members of the Board in other than a permanent status. Under the Senate bill, the Chairman of the Board would be authorized, but only when there are 65 members on the Board, to appoint individuals from the professional staff of the Board to serve as "temporary" members of the Board for terms of up to one year each and to reappoint any such individual no more than once within the three-year period following the expiration of an initial appointment. Also, the Senate bill would authorize the Chairman, when there is a temporary absence of a Board member from one of the Board's three-member sections, to appoint an individual from the professional staff of the Board to serve as an "acting" member of the Board on that section for a period of up to 30 days at a time, with a maximum of 60 days service in any fiscal year.

Under H.R. 2936, the Chairman would be authorized to designate an employee of the VA who is an attorney or a physician to serve temporarily as a member of the Board without any time limitation.

Under the Senate bill and H.R. 2936, no section of the Board could have more than one individual who is serving as a member on an other-than-permanent basis.

The compromise agreement (section 208) follows the Senate bill with modifications to delete the requirement that non-permanent members be drawn from the Board's staff; to authorize the Chairman to designate individuals as "acting" members to fill vacancies temporarily, as well as to serve in the event of temporary absences; and to lengthen the maximum periods of such designations to periods of up to 90 days, but not to exceed, in the case of any individual, a maximum total of 270 days in any 12-month period.

The Committees note that, although a requirement that an individual designated to the Board on an other-than-permanent basis be "from the professional staff of the Board" (Senate bill) or "an employee of the Veterans' Administration who is an attorney or a physician" (H.R. 2936) is not included in the compromise agreement, they intend that any non-permanent members be drawn from the professional staff of the Board unless no such staff members with appropriate qualifications for the positions involved are available. The Committees also note that, although the compromise agreement uses the word "designate" (as used in H.R. 2636) rather than "appoint" (as used in the Senate bill) to describe the Board Chairman's authority to place an individual on the Board in a non-permanent position, the Committees contemplate that, when a qualified employee of the Veterans' Administration is not available, it would be appropriate for a non-VA employee to be given an appointment for the purpose of serving as a non-permanent Board member pursuant to a designation by the Chairman.

The Senate bill (section 211), but not H.R. 2936, would amend section 4003(a) of title 38 to preclude temporary or acting members from casting a vote in cases in which the votes of the two permanent members are split.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

The Committees intend, however, in providing the limited authorities for temporary and acting members, that the Chairman of the Board will continue the current practice of expanding the panel, or convening another panel, in cases in which the votes of the permanent members are split and a temporary or acting member votes against the claimant.

The Senate bill (section 211), but not H.R. 2936, would further amend section 4001 of title 38 to require the Administrator to report annually, as part of the annual report to the Congress required by section 214 of title 38, on the implementation of the provisions (described above) authorizing the designation of acting and temporary Board members.

The compromise agreement (section 208) contains this provision.

The Senate bill (section 211), but not H.R. 2936, would further amend section 4001 of title 38 to require the Chairman of the Board to report annually to the appropriate committees of the Congress on the Board's current and projected future workload together with an evaluation of the Board's ability, based on current and future personnel levels, to dispose of appeals in a timely manner.

The compromise agreement does not contain this provision.

Membership of Special Medical Advisory Group

The Senate bill (section 208), but not the House bill, would amend section 4112 of title 38 to expand, effective on the date of enactment, the membership of the VA's Special Medical Advisory Group to include individuals, other than members of health and allied scientific professions specified in current law, who have experience pertinent to the missions of the VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery.

The compromise agreement (section 209) contains this provision.

Revision of Effective Date for Certain Reserve Officers' Training Corps Participants' Eligibility for Veterans' Administration Benefits

The House bill (section 409), but not the Senate bill, would revise the effective date provision (subsection (d)) of section 113 of the Veterans' Compensation, Education, and Employment Amendments of 1982 (Public Law 97-306)—which provided general title 38 benefits eligibility to Senior Reserve Officers' Training Corps (SROTC) participants who, after September 30, 1982, incur a disability during field training or a practice cruise—so as to provide, effective October 1, 1983, such eligibility to SROTC participants who incurred a disability during field training or a practice cruise before October 1, 1982.

The compromise agreement (section 210) contains this provision.

Pilot Program for Expediting Certain Medical Facility Construction Projects

The Senate bill (section 209), but not the House bill, contains a provision that would permit certain medical facility construction projects to be expedited. Specifically, it would authorize the Administrator to obligate up to $25 million from the so-called "working reserve" in the VA's major construction account in fiscal year 1984 in order to undertake working drawings for certain construction projects prior to either the adoption of resolutions approving the projects by the House and Senate Veterans' Affairs Committees or the approval of the projects in the appropriations process. However, the Administrator would also be required, at least 30 days before initiating working drawings for a medical facility construction project, to provide the Veterans' Affairs and Appropriations Committees of both Houses with written notice of the intention to do so, together with the estimated cost of the drawings and the estimated range of the total costs of the construction project. No funds could be expended under this provision for working drawings for the replacement or new construction of a complete health-care facility, nor could more than $2.5 million be spent on working drawings for any one project.

The compromise agreement (section 211) contains a provision derived from the Senate provision with amendments. These amendments would also permit the VA to obligate funds for working drawings in fiscal year 1985—for projects on which construction could be initiated in fiscal year 1985 or 1986—with the same total $25 million limitation operating as a cap on aggregate expenditures for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 combined, and would provide a clarifying definition of "working drawings".

Springfield Confederate Cemetery

The Senate bill (section 210), but not the House bill, would, effective on the date of enactment, provide that the land comprising the present Springfield (Missouri) Confederate Cemetery shall be considered part of the Springfield National Cemetery and remove a restriction on the use of that land which permits the burial of only Confederate veterans.

The compromise agreement (section 212) contains this provision.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I support and applaud the unanimous-consent request of the distinguished chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee. The agreement reached on the bill before us is a good agreement and one that the House ought to agree to.

We have reached an accord with the other body on fundamental issues. This bill provides for an increase in compensation for service connected disabled veterans, their dependents, and survivors that is in accord with the increase in the cost of living as recorded by the Consumer Price Index. This increase carries out the congressional promise of many years that benefits for service-connected disabled veterans is the first priority of our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman's request also assures a long-needed increase in the membership of the Board of Veterans Appeals of the Veterans' Administration. All of us know that such an increase is imperative and the House has previously expressed its will on this issue.

Other aspects of Senate bill 1388 have been the subject of extensive negotiations with the other body. They include a limited liberalization of benefits for hospitalized disabled service connected veterans, increased compensation for a few blind veterans who also have hearing difficulties, and a liberalization of benefits to former prisoners of war who have a certain kind of depressive neurosis.

All in all, Mr. Speaker, this is the culmination of efforts of both bodies of the Congress to assist those veterans who are our prime responsibility. We are within budget restrictions and expectations and I urge full support of this measure by all of my colleagues and I congratulate the chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee for his efforts in bringing this measure to final resolution.

● Mr. LEATH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of technical amendments in this bill relating to educational programs administered by the Veterans' Administration which I have reviewed and support.

An agreement has been reached to delete the Senate amendment which would extend the termination date for entitlement to GI bill benefits beyond December 31, 1989, for certain individuals who may be on active duty beyond that date.

I want the RECORD to show that I support the chairman of my committee, the gentleman from Mississippi, in having this provision deleted. I hope that the action of the House in rejecting the extension of the termination date for GI bill benefits will send a signal to the Pentagon, as well as those on the other side of the Capitol. The House is just not going to accept extending the termination date beyond December 31, 1989.

As the Members know, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs reported H.R. 1400, the Veterans' Educational Assistance Act of 1983, on May 16, 1983. The bill is currently pending before the Armed Services Committee. The Department of Defense is opposed to the bill. I strongly recommend that the Department of Defense get behind this bill and lend its support to its enactment before this 98th Congress adjourns.

H.R. 1400 will provide educational benefits for personnel who remain on active duty beyond December 31, 1989.

Mr. Speaker, so that everyone will understand what I am saying, either DOD support H.R. 1400 which will provide educational benefits beyond 1989 for active duty military personnel, or educational benefits for thousands of active duty personnel will expire. I can assure everyone that the 1989 termination date is not going to be extended.●

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, I support the compromise reached on this bill, and I most pleased that a cost-of-living increase is provided to veterans with service-connected disabilities, their dependents, and survivors.

I am also pleased that an agreement was reached with respect to certain blinded veterans, and those veterans who are hospitalized in excess of 21 days.

S. 1388 will also authorize an increase in size of the Veterans' Appeals Boards which is vitally needed. I commend the chairman of our committee, Mr. MONTGOMERY, the ranking member Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT, and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Compensation, Pension, and Insurance, my colleague from Ohio, Mr. APPLEGATE, for their efforts in shepherding this legislation through the Congress.

Thank you.●

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY)?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY).

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the Senate bill was amended so as to read: "An Act to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase the rates of compensation for disabled veterans and the rates of dependency and indemnity compensation for survivors; to express the sense of the Congress that increases in the rates of compensation should take effect on December 1 beginning in fiscal year 1985; and for other purposes."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION OF INQUIRY DIRECTING THE PRESIDENT TO FURNISH CERTAIN INFORMATION TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES WITH RESPECT TO U.S. ACTIVITIES REGARDING GRENADA

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the Committee on Armed Services, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-597, part I) on the resolution (H. Res. 383) directing the President to furnish certain information to the House of Representatives with respect to U.S. activities regarding Grenada, which was ordered to be printed.

CONSTRUCTION WORK IN PROGRESS POLICY ACT OF 1983

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 375 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 555.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 555) to amend the Federal Power Act to limit the recovery by public utilities of certain costs of construction work in progress through rate increases, with Mr. DORGAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Tuesday, February 7, 1984, all time for general debate had expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the reported bill shall be considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment, and each section shall be considered as having been read.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The text of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

H.R. 555

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Construction Work in Progress Policy Act of 1983".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) it is in the public interest that electric utilities have a cash flow adequate to support investments in resources that are in the interest of their ratepayers;

(2) it is in the public interest that electric energy services be delivered at least possible cost, and with adequate reliability, and that unnecessary rate increases be avoided;

(3) inclusion of the costs of construction work in progress in public utility rate bases established by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission causes rate increases;

(4) inclusion of the costs of construction work in progress in public utility rate bases established by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission may, in some cases, cause anticompetitive price discrimination and may, in some cases, cause some utility customers to pay for utility facilities that they will not use;

(5) inclusion of the costs of cosntruction work in progress in public utility rate bases established by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission violates the principle that today's ratepayers should pay through rates only for the costs of facilities in service to them; it also transfers a portion of the risk of financing the construction of additional facilities from shareholders to ratepayers; and

(6) the adequacy of cash flow of some electric utilities in poor financial health may be improved in a manner that is consistent with the interests of their ratepayers by the inclusion of some of the costs of construction work in progress in public utility rate bases established by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and, thus, the Commission should have discretion to approve such inclusion, on a case-by-case basis, pursuant to policies and procedures established by law.

PURPOSE

SEC. 3. It is the purpose of this Act to establish policies and procedures governing the inclusion of costs of construction work in progress in the rate bases of public utilities regulated under the Federal Power Act.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL POWER ACT

SEC. 4. The Federal Power Act is amended by adding the following new section at the end of part II:

"COSTS OF CONSTRUCTION WORK IN PROGRESS

"SEC. 213. (a) Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect the authority of the commission to approve the inclusion of the following costs of construction work in progress in the rate base of a public utility in accordance with the provisions of sections 205 and 206 of this Act—

"(1) the costs of any pollution control facility; and

"(2) the costs of conversion of oil and natural gas-fired facilities to the use of fuels other than oil or natural gas.

For purposes of the following provisions of this section, the term 'costs of construction work in progress' shall be treated as not including the costs referred to in paragraphs (1) and (2).

"(b) Upon application of a public utility, the Commission shall, consistent with the provisions of subsections (c) through (k) of this section, approve inclusion of the costs of construction work in progress in the rate base of such public utility.

"(c) Any public utility whose internal generation of funds from rates established by the Commission and from all other sources of funds related to the Commission's jurisdiction in a test period established by the Commission is, after subtraction of interest payments and dividends (except reinvested dividends) subject to the Commission's jurisdiction, 40 per centum or less of planned construction expenditures subject to the Commission's jurisdiction in such test period may file an application for the inclusion of the costs of construction work in progress in the rate base of such public utility.

"(d) Any application submitted to the Commission under subsection (c) shall contain—

"(1) a detailed description of the financial condition of the public utility filing the application and, if the public utility is in 'severe financial difficulty', as defined by the Commission by rule, a certification of such condition;

"(2) a detailed description of construction expenditures subject to the Commission's jurisdiction in the test period and detailed description of funds to be internally generated during that period from rates prescribed by the Commission and all other sources of funds related to the Commission's jurisdiction;

"(3) a statement explaining the need for the facility proposed to be included in the rate base and describing the public utility's construction program, including a detailed assessment of the potential of alternative means of meeting demand for electric energy services at least system cost with adequate reliability, including—

"(i) customer consumption efficiency improvements and use of renewable resources,

"(ii) load management techniques,

"(iii) cogeneration,

"(iv) electricity generation using biomass, waste, renewable resources, or geothermal resources,

"(v) changes in rate design,

"(vi) production efficiency improvements (including improved powerplant productivity and inter-utility coordination), and

"(vii) any other alternatives established by the Commission by rule; and

"(4) such other information reasonably related to the commission's duties under this Act as the Commission shall by rule require.

"(e) Upon application by a public utility under subsection (c) of this section, the Commission shall commence an evidentiary hearing. In any such hearing, the burden of proof to show that any increased rate for which application is made under this subsection is consistent with the requirements of this section shall be upon the applicant. The Commission shall give to the hearing and decision of such questions the same preference as is given to questions arising in proceedings brought under subsections (a) through (e) of section 205, and the Commission shall decide such questions as speedily as possible.

"(f) If an application filed by a public utility pursuant to subsection (c) of this section contains a certification of 'severe financial difficulty' (as defined by the Commission by rule) and if the Commission finds that such public utility is in 'severe financial difficulty', the Commission, after preliminary adjudicatory hearing on the matter of the validity of the certification, shall permit, by order, the inclusion of the costs of such public utility's construction work in progress in the rate base and shall permit any rate increase attributable to such inclusion in the rate base, subject to the limitations set forth in paragraphs (1), (5), and (6) of subsection (h) of this section, to take effect immediately. The Commission shall require any public utility collecting any such rate increase to refund, with interest, to the persons on whose behalf such increases were paid, such portion of such increased rates as, by final order issued pursuant to subsection (g) of this section, shall not be found justified.

"(g) If, after evidentiary hearing, the Commission finds that—

"(1) the facility, the costs of which are proposed to be included in the rate base of a public utility submitting an application pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, is reasonably necessary to meet the demand of its customers for electric energy services at least system cost with adequate reliability, after accounting for all measures determined to be of less system cost, and

"(2) the financial condition of the public utility would, in the test period, likely be such as to prevent the financing of such facility by borrowing except at a cost significantly higher than the average cost of new long-term debt within the electric utility industry during that period, after taking account of the possibility of innovative financing methods, the Commission shall permit, by order, the inclusion of such costs of construction work in progress in rate base subject to the limitations contained in subsection (h) of this section.

"(h) The amount of costs of construction work in progress permitted to be included in a public utility's rate base by Commission order issued pursuant to subsection (g) of this section shall be limited by the following conditions—

"(1) no such costs in excess of those necessary to restore the internal generation of funds from rates established by the Commission and from all other sources of funds related to the Commission's jurisdiction during the test period established by the Commission, to a level of 40 per centum of construction expenditures subject to the Commission's jurisdiction, after subtraction of interest payments and dividends (except reinvested dividends) subject to the Commission's jurisdiction, during such test period shall be permitted to be included in such public utility's rate base;

"(2) no such costs that the Commission finds to have been imprudently incurred, including costs incurred because of mismanagement of the public utility, shall be permitted in such public utility's rate base;

"(3) no rate increase attributable to the inclusion of such costs in such public utility's rate base shall be so substantial as to have an anticompetitive effect, including the establishment of unreasonable price discrimination between wholesale and retail customers of such public utility and no such rate increase shall be otherwise unduly discriminatory or preferential;

"(4) upon certification by a customer of such public utility that a facility, or portion thereof, the costs of which are proposed to be included in rate base by such public utility will not be used to serve such customer or will provide service to such customer for only a fraction of such facility's useful life, the Commission shall limit the increase of rates to such customer attributable to the inclusion of such facility in such public utility's rate base to an amount that is just and reasonable in light of the facts of the situation;

"(5) in the first two years beginning on the date of promulgation of rules pursuant to subsection (j) of this section, no rate increase attributable to the inclusion of the costs of construction work in progress shall exceed 6 per centum per annum of the rates in effect on the date of promulgation of such rules; and

"(6) no electric energy rate increase attributable to the inclusion of such costs in the rate base may be charged for electric energy sold prior to the date of a Commission order approving such increase.

"(i) Public utilities shall discontinue the capitalization of allowance for funds used during construction for those costs of construction work in progress which are included in the rate base pursuant to this section.

"(j) Not later than one hundred and eighty days from the date of enactment of this section, the Commission shall promulgate rules governing the implementation of authorities granted in this section.

"(k) The Commission shall require that an amount of revenues equal to the amount of revenues derived from construction work in progress in the rate base of a public utility shall be deferred from inclusion in the rates of that utility when the facility becomes used and useful for public service, for a period of time which is no longer than the period over which construction work in progress has been included in jurisdictional rates, insofar as the Commission determines that such action is just and reasonable.

"(l) As used in this section, the term—

"(1) 'construction work in progress' means construction of a facility used to generate or transmit electric energy which construction is undertaken, or proposed to be undertaken, but which is not yet in service.

"(2) 'allowance for funds used during construction' means the cost of funds used for construction work in progress.

"(3) 'system cost' means an estimate of all the direct costs of a resource over its effective life, including the cost of generation transmission and distribution, if subject to the Commission's jurisdiction, and, among other factors, waste disposal costs, end-of-cycle costs, and fuel costs (including projected increases and decreases), and such quantifiable environmental costs as are directly attributable to such resource.".

□ 1530

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, just to set the framework for the debate that is about to take place, I would like to point out to the members of the committee that this is probably as important a piece of consumer legislation as we will see. While the issue sounds technical to many people, it really is quite simple. The question is whether the financing of new construction by utilities shall be borne by the shareholders or by the consumers.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has issued a rule that says virtually automatically 50 percent of those costs of construction can be placed in rate base. That is unsound. It is the shareholders who make the profits in any other private enterprise. The shareholders ought to take the risk.

Furthermore, automatically having the consumers finance new construction to the extent of 50 percent will create a tremendous incentive for overbuilding. And we have seen in the last 10 years more than 100 powerplants canceled. If those powerplants were built with construction work in progress, then it is the consumer who will end up holding the bag. The consumer has no control over management for its bad decisions. The shareholders do. It is highly inequitable that consumers, when a plant is abandoned, should have to bear those financing costs rather than the shareholders.

This matter has been considered by our committee with a great deal of care. We have had two hearings. The record of those hearings runs some 568 pages. We have had 24 witnesses. In addition, in the 97th Congress, we held 11 hearings with more than 100 witnesses submitting testimony on utility issues related to CWIP. In the first session of this Congress, we have already held eight hearings on the issues involving the financial health of the utility industry, and just yesterday we held a hearing on utility demand and capacity studies in which CWIP was specifically addressed.

The matter has been very carefully considered. The FERC did not very carefully consider it. The 2 years it took for consideration of this matter—and our committee has considered it for 3 years—was mostly engaged in a dispute among the Commissioners, two of whom wanted to include 100 percent CWIP in the rate base and the others did not. The 50 percent they came up with was not the result of any scientific study. There is no record to back it up as a sound rule. It was a straight compromise between the Commissioners who thought they ought to put CWIP in the rate base to 100 percent, as the utilities wanted, and those who thought it ought to be a restricted policy.

The compromise that we have come up with is a sound one. We say that ordinarily shareholders ought to finance the risk of investments from which they profit. But where a utility can show that a plant is truly needed and its cash flow problems and its ability to raise money in the marketplace at reasonable rates is such that they could not build a truly needed powerplant, then we say it is appropriate for consumers to be charged.

The FERC itself says that automatic CWIP in the rate base will result in increased costs to the consumers. It will encourage unneeded powerplants, and it shifts the risk from where they being, the shareholders under the free enterprise system, to the consumers who ought not to be asked to bear those risks.

I strongly urge passage of the legislation.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. MOORHEAD

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. MOORHEAD: Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Construction Work in Progress Act of 1984".

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL POWER ACT

SEC. 2. The Federal Power Act is amended by adding the following new section at the end of part II:

"COSTS OF CONSTRUCTION WORK IN PROGRESS

"SEC. 213. (a) The Commission may approve the inclusion of construction work in progress in the rate base of a public utility in accordance with the final rule of the Commission published in the Federal Register on June 1, 1983 and effective July 1, 1983 (48 Fed. Reg. 24353, et seq.).

"(b) Nothing in subsection (a) shall be construed to affect the authority of the Commission to amend or modify the final rule referred to in subsection (a) in accordance with the provisions of sections 205 and 206 of this Act.".

Mr. OTTINGER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of a point of order.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment to H.R. 555 would simply provide that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission may approve the inclusion of construction work in progress in a utility's rate base in accordance with the final FERC rule on CWIP which became effective on July 1, 1983. This amendment was offered by me during subcommittee markup and it failed by only one vote.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the FERC rule on CWIP is eminently fair and reasonable, and is a necessary response to some very real financial problems in the electric utility industry. The amendment I offer would prevent Congress from substituting its judgment for that of the Regulatory Agency which has given this subject careful consideration.

The Commissioners at the FERC studied this issue for 2 years. They received testimony from all concerned parties. And they agreed unanimously to adopt this limited rule which they believe fulfilled their regulatory responsibility, both to protect the ratepayer from high rates, while at the same time insuring that utilities will continue to provide economic and reliable utility service, now and in the future.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, the FERC rule allows utilities to recover a cash return on the financing (or carrying costs only) on 50 percent of their investment in plants under construction. Of course, none of the principal which the utility has invested in the plant is recoverable until the plant is placed in service.

Everyone admits that sooner or later the consumer is going to pay both for the cost of the plant and for the financing of the plant if the plant becomes operable. The people who have invested their money in the company that built the plant are not going to get 1 penny return on investment until the plant goes into operation. The only thing that is covered here is 50 percent of the financing charges on the project and, in the long run, it will create lower rates for the consumer because if it has to be placed on the continuing debt of the firm, eventually the cost to the consumer will be much higher.

FERC estimates the average initial rate increase to wholesale customers will be limited to 3.57 percent. In any case, to protect consumers from any unanticipated rate increases, the amendment I propose today contains a consumer cap of 6 percent per year on any rate increase attributable to the FERC rule during the first 2 years that the rule is in effect.

This ruling by the Commission will affect less than 8 percent of all sales of electricity by investor-owned utilities in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, one of the objectives which FERC seeks to achieve by this rule is to lessen any bias which may discourage construction of new generating facilities. Last summer, the Department of Energy released a major study which stated that reliable electric service may be jeopardized by 1990. DOE concluded that there are significant financial disincentives to capital investment which will prevent the timely and effective addition of new capital. The disincentives identified included the regulatory treatment of funds for construction work in progress.

The study estimated that annual electric bills could be as much as $18 billion higher by the end of the century as utilities try desperately to meet electric power demand by resorting to costly—but quickly available—natural gas and oil-fired turbines.

Recently, Secretary Hodel warned that "the failure to allow utilities to build more powerplants will come home to roost. Growth in electric consumption will continue." Dun & Bradstreet's Power Engineering and the North American Electric Reliability Council have also warned of imminent electricity shortages.

Prior to the markup of this legislation in the Energy and Commerce Committee, I received a letter from the Department of Energy, as did the other members of this committee, which clearly spelled out the danger of adopting the bill before us today. This letter clearly states that, and I quote:

If passed, (H.R. 555) would adversely impact the ability and willingness of the Nation's private electric utility companies to make the long-term investments necessary to assure reliable electric power supplies at minimum cost * * * by perpetrating disincentives to necessary capital investment, H.R. 555 would serve to increase consumer costs in the long run and potentially increase oil imports on a noneconomic basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD) has expired.

(On request of Mr. OTTINGER and by unanimous consent, Mr. MOORHEAD was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield just briefly?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

□ 1650

Mr. OTTINGER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, to clarify the position for the committee, what the gentleman's amendment does is to codify the FERC rule permitting 50 percent inclusion of construction work in progress?

Mr. MOORHEAD. That is correct. Absolutely.

Mr. OTTINGER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, while a strategy of no-growth may have been compatible with the stagflation of the late seventies, it is clear that such a strategy will not work in the rapidly growing economy which is being fostered by current policies. Growth in electric demand has consistently outpaced growth in the gross national product.

Mr. Chairman, the dangers of not having an adequate and secure supply of electricity are clear. Brownouts will allocate limited supply. Electricity costs will rise as uneconomic and inefficient generators are rushed into service. Consumption will be diverted into less efficient energy sources. Most importantly, the higher cost and unreliability of electricity will constrain economic growth. Businesses will expand their operations abroad and may in fact relocate their existing operations. American business will lose its competitive edge.

In light of the uncertainties of the future, the goal of national policy must be to encourage the unfettered operation of the marketplace and devise approaches to utility regulation which are flexible and responsive to economic forces. It is for precisely this reason that FERC has been vested with its authority. In light of FERC's extensive and careful consideration of this matter, Congress should rely on FERC's expertise.

Mr. Chairman, I want to point out to the Members of this House that these Federal regulatory agencies are put into place to protect the public. When they made a finding after years of study, they are not trying to be the enemy of society, of our consumer; they are acting for the consumer, in their best interest, as they see that interest.

For the House, in a brief period of time, to try to override their decisions, with very little evidence before the committee, I think is irresponsible. I would point out that there have been hearings held on electric power, on the development and financing of power, in the committee, but there was only a 1-day hearing on this particular bill. If we are going to be able to judge what a piece of legislation actually does, and its need in the entire environment, we have to be able to precisely zap in on that one piece of legislation. We cannot go on generalities.

The Commission has done their work. They have studied this question over a long period of time, and I think they have come up with the best answers.

For this and other reasons, Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support this amendment, which would codify the FERC rule and would help insure our ratepayers of adequate, reliable, and reasonably priced electricity in the future.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

This amendment, of course, would simply put us back to where we started and negate the whole purpose of this bill. I would like to relate the experience of the State of Oregon.

The people of the State of Oregon adopted in an initiative resolution in the late 1970's a Construction Work in Progress Act. It is the law of the State of Oregon, and it has been the law of the State of Oregon now for 5 years.

It has worked exceedingly well. It has done two things. First of all, the law adopted by the people of the State of Oregon on construction work in progress did simply this: It said to the utility industry, "While you have plants under construction, prior to their operating, you must not charge us in our electric bills for the cost of these plants."

It was a very simple measure. As I say, it has worked exceedingly well. It has saved the consumers not only hundreds, probably billions, of dollars but even more importantly, it acted to help the market work.

Prior to adoption of a construction work in progress law in Oregon, the utility industry had plans to build dozens of plants and had, indeed, under construction a number of them. They had also spent hundreds of millions of dollars on plans for other plants. By charging the consumer for these plants and all costs involved in these plants, they had a blank check. So the leaders of the industry had no checks on them, no market checks at all. They said, "We will just go ahead and build these plants, pass the cost off to the consumer, and it is not going to cost our stockholders a thing. As a matter of fact, we will probably make money on them because it increases the capitalization and the indebtedness of our utility."

By passing construction work in progress in Oregon, it served notice to the utility industry to look over their plans for building these plants. Did load growth forecasts really indicate a need for the plants? As the utilities began looking over their projections for additional plants more carefully, knowing their stockholders would have to pay for them, they found, indeed, they did not need the plants.

The Skagit plants in the State of Washington were canceled. The Pebble Springs plants in the State of Oregon were canceled. Thank goodness they were. Even with those canceled, we have a glut of electricity in the Northwest. We have several thousand megawatts in surplus that we are desperately trying to sell at bargain-basement prices.

So construction work in progress worked exceedingly well in Oregon doing those two things. It saved the consumer the hundreds of millions of dollars that the utility industry would have tried to place in their electric bills for the cost of these plants that were not complete and will never be complete, and this indeed has been a boon.

The responsibility lay with the industry itself, with the utilities themselves. They made the mistakes. They were stockholder companies. Capitalism implies a risk. But more importantly, I think, construction work in progress said to the industry, "Be more careful, be more cautious with your projections of needed plants. Do not think you have a blank check just to pass the costs on, because your stockholders are going to have to bear a responsibility and, therefore, you must make a sound and prudent business decision; not just simply go helter-skelter on in building plants we do not need because you know the consumer will eventually pay for them."

With that, I ask the House to oppose this amendment, as it would simply negate the whole purpose of the bill, and consider the experience in Oregon where construction work in progress has been eminently successful.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in my remarks yesterday I tried to make the point that consumers are going to pay the cost sooner or later. It is not a question of whether or not they are going to pay; they are going to pay those costs. It is just a matter of when.

The facts show that under the amendment offered by the gentleman from California that those costs that the consumers will bear will be far less than under H.R. 555. Let me try to illustrate that, if I may, with this chart that I have here.

This chart shows first a 7-year construction period. Then after that, the part that is cross-hatched, a 30-year useful service life of the electric utility. Under this illustration that I am trying to show here, we are talking about a typical coal-burning plant that would cost $1 billion to construct.

□ 1700

Now, under this blue area within the 7-year construction period, if a full 100 percent of construction work in progress were included at the rate base, the cost to consumers to finance that portion over that 7-year construction cycle would be $410 million. However, if we had to wait until the construction period has been completed and then put the cost into the rate base, it is going to throw the cost up into this redline up above.

However, if we have some of the cost up front and then amortize the cost over the 30-year life of the program, is it going to cost considerably less over that 30-year period.

The redline area represents $1.244 billion additional cost to ratepayers if construction work in progress is not in the rate base. In other words, thus the consumer is going to pay three times as much to finance this plant if CWIP is not in the rate base. That is three times $410 million which is up front, as compared to $1 billion 244 million if we have to wait until after the construction period before that cost goes into the rate base.

Now, all Members have been furnished this information on a chart. I would urge that they take a look at it. I think the figures clearly show that H.R. 555 is not in the consumer's interest.

The gentleman from California offers an amendment that would call for one-half or 50 percent of the financing cost for new plants to be placed immediately into the rate base. In contrast, H.R. 555 insures a rate shock by saying that all those costs will go on at the end of the construction period, starting here, and thus those rates to finance those costs would have to go up to that extent.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROYHILL. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage the gentleman in a dialog. I have some fundamental questions.

Although one could make some arguments about the changes in the value of money over time, as one of my other colleagues, I am sure, will bring up shortly, I do not argue that the gentleman's general representation is an accurate one. I guess what I question is some of his fundamental assumptions, and that is this: How does the utility management decide whether or not it is going to build a generating facility or take a look at other options that exist in the free marketplace at the moment?

For instance, if we provide them construction work in progress, we are giving them an incentive to go toward production and toward building new generating facilities. What happens to my community and other communities around the country that are negotiating presently with utilities to set up garbage-to-steam-to-energy plants? The electric company now has an incentive not to negotiate with my communities, but it has an incentive to build new facilities.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, may I respond to the question?

Mr. GEJDENSON. Yes. I would really like to hear the answer.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California, of course, has taken care of that in his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BROYHILL was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD) requires the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to address the needs for that additional power as soon as they file for the construction work in progress, at the start of plant construction.

Mr. GEJDENSON. All right. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BROYHILL. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, if we are turning that decision over to the Government regulators, if we want Government to make all decisions on the need for a new generating facility, and if we are going to have the taxpayers pay—in this case they happen to be ratepayers; it is just as if we were voting for a new tax on electric consumers by forcing them to prepay for this facility—if we are going to ask the taxpayer-ratepayer to pay for the facility and if we are going to ask the Government to decide whether or not we need that facility, then, for God's sake, why do we need to give the utility a profit on it?

If I am going to pay for it, if Goverment is going to decide whether or not we need it, why do we not just build it and we will sell the electricity to the utility and, if there is a profit, we will give it back to the ratepayer?

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman must have a misunderstanding of how these costs are amortized, because if we have a plant that is built, say, taking 7 years to construct, and then they start amortizing all those costs at the end of that 7-year construction period, as this chart seems to show——

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, that is just the way it should——

Mr. BROYHILL. I have still got the time.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Yes.

Mr. BROYHILL. And, Mr. Chairman, I am trying to explain to the gentleman how the system really works.

So that those costs are going to be amortized, the consumers are going to pay for it sooner or later, and if they start paying sooner, they are going to certainly have a far lower cost over the 30-year life of that plant.

I also want to point out that perhaps the gentleman has not read all of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, because his amendment does require a utility to consider all other options to new plant construction before it can receive CWIP.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. BROYHILL. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, the only incentive they are providing to the utility is an incentive to go into construction work, so that while we tell the utility manager—and I believe they are all honest and decent gentlemen—to take a look at all other options, what we are guaranteeing him is a profit if he starts to build, whether he finishes or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BROYHILL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, I would point out again that the Members should please read the gentleman's amendment. The gentleman's amendment says that the utility must do certain things. If they apply to ask for 50 percent of the carrying charges to be put into the rate base during this construction period, in order to get approval of that they must have considered the feasibility of adopting alternate strategies such as cogeneration or wind or solar or geothermal or perhaps someone else's power that might be available in the region.

So under this amendment the utility must fully assess the conservation potential and energy saving load management techniques and explain why these alternatives to new plant construction are not capable of meeting the ratepayers' electric demand.

So, Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL) has expired.

(On request of Mr. OTTINGER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BROYHILL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROYHILL. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, first I think it should be pointed out that while the utility in its filing must state the alternatives that it has investigated, there is no obligation under the amendment offered by the gentleman from California that FERC do anything with this information. The inclusion in the rate base of the 50 percent is virtually automatic unless they find it is not a prudent investment.

Is that not the case?

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission would have ample authority to utilize this information and to deny the inclusion of CWIP if they find that other alternate power is available to the consumers in that area. They would certainly rule that that would not be a prudent investment.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, that is the finding that would have to be made, and there is no provision, as there is under our bill, that FERC actually make an investigation and have a hearing with respect to the advantages of alternate means of production or conservation. Under the FERC rule there is only the requirement of a filing, and upon the filing it is practically automatically approved.

Mr. BROYHILL. There are ample laws under which they operate in approving these requests for the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission to make those determinations.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further with respect to the chart?

Mr. BROYHILL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I am concerned, because I have a chart, which I will explain, and it shows that at every point, since the consumer is financing it, the consumer has to pay more. It is true at the end of the construction of the plant, and at the end of the useful life of the plant, the consumer will have paid everything, assuming that the plant is built.

But we have a situation, for example, with New England Power where they had asked for CWIP in the rate base. Now, they have concluded that it would be advantageous for its customers to withdraw from the ownership—this is Seabrook Unit No. 2—and thus New England Power is attempting to sell its shares of unit 2 or, in the alternative, get cancellation of the unit.

If you had CWIP in operation in that case, is it not true that it is the consumer that would have borne the burden of financing a canceled plant, when the consumer has no power over the management at all, the shareholders have that control and the shareholders do have control over the management and could do something about it.

Mr. BROYHILL. Well, Mr. Chairman, if I could say if I have the time, the gentleman well knows that the rate treatment of an abandoned construction project is not affected by this bill or this rule that FERC has come up with. The rate treatment of canceled plants, to my understanding, is the subject of other law which we are not addressing here today.

In other words, that law focuses on the prudency of management decisions to undertake the project in the first place and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. OTTINGER and by unanimous consent, Mr. BROYHILL was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. BROYHILL. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. OTTINGER. What the gentleman says is accurate so far as he states it; but if there has been CWIP allowed in the rate base, the consumer will have paid the financing charges for whatever period of time the plant has been under construction.

Mr. BROYHILL. Well, what I am saying, if I can state this, as I understand the law, is that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in those cases retains full authority to require the refunding of CWIP payments that the ratepayers may have made and where there has been a determination that they are unreasonable or that they are improper.

Mr. OTTINGER. Well, if the gentleman would yield further, it is my understanding that as a matter of practice FERC has not done that. Just as a matter of practice, FERC has not even looked at the filings that were made before it for CWIP treatment. There have now been a number of applications and they have just automatically granted the requests. Once the application is filed, there could be challenge with respect to prudency, but there is no regular provision for examining whether or not this is a prudent investment or indeed, whether or not it is a least cost investment. That is what concerns us about the FERC rule. It makes it much easier to finance plants that may in fact be imprudent, may in fact end up being in excess of the needs for the area, as we have seen in so many plants around the country, including the Shoreham in my area. You end up having to spend billions of dollars for a plant which when the building is completed is found to be really not needed.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, I reclaim my time. I have been generous in yielding, but the problem that we face as we go into the next couple of decades is an adequate supply of energy. Without reasonably priced electricity, this country is going to stop. Domestic manufacturing is already finding that it is lower priced to go to other countries. Jobs are lost there and if we do not have energy, we are not going to find people willing to invest in this country.

I do not see anything in the gentleman's bill, H.R. 555, that would help the ratepayers under those kinds of circumstances.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROYHILL. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. The gentleman has been very generous in yielding and I appreciate it.

There are a couple things I want to discuss with the gentleman, however.

First of all, the chart, and the gentleman's statement as well with the chart that the consumer either pays now or pays later; but you know, people spend a lot of money to pay later, whether it is taxes or anything else. Why? Because money is worth something over time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. MOODY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BROYHILL was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, people will pay a lot of money to postpone payment because money is worth something over time, whether it is taxes or anything else; so that merely adding up dollars irrespective of the year they fall in is not legitimate, because a dollar 10 years from now is worth a lot less now than a dollar now is worth now; so it is not really legitimate to add up dollars irrespective of the year they fall in.

Mr. BROYHILL. I can understand the gentleman's argument; however, we all know that as soon as that plant is completed, that all of those costs, the construction costs as well as the interest costs that have been expended during the construction cycle are going to be added to the rate base; so those costs or these extra costs are these that are on top here, those are going to be added on. That is coming out of the consumers' pocket.

Under the gentleman's scenario, what about them adding an interest cost on that, too? We have not added any interest on either side; so if we want to add interest on this money, then in fairness we are going to have to add interest on that money which is far more, more than three times as much.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield a bit further, I will address that.

That is quite true and it a valid point so far as it goes. The problem is that if I borrow money, I borrow it at probably at least double the rate that the utility does. It costs me much more in my financing on the borrowing side of my balance sheet with the borrowers and lenders on the borrowing side of my balance sheet, spending 18 percent for my credit card, Mastercard, Visa, and those kinds of charge cards, whereas the utility has a far lower cost of financing; so if I can get the utility to finance it, rather than my financing it in year 1, I would like to use their financing so that I kick in my share in year 10, it is certainly in my interest. It is not in my interest to have it come out of my income now when I can put it off later purely on a financing charge basis.

The utility pays at least half of what I would pay on an annual basis to finance the same amount of money. It is far cheaper for me to have the utility with its great borrowing power and low risk than it is for me in effect to have the money up front and then have it rolled in later.

Mr. BROYHILL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to continue longer. I have been up here for some time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROYHILL. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the gentleman should try to tell us that the average person who might have a maximum of 6 percent added to his electrical bill, assuming he had a $100 electric bill and you added $6 to it for this purpose, would go out and borrow the money at 18 percent? It is not going to be borrowed. He would be paying as he goes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. MOODY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BROYHILL was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BROYHILL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, the answer to that, I say to the gentleman, is that we are all borrowers and lenders. No, I do not go out and borrow specifically to cover that $6; but all of us at the end of a month are borrowers and lenders simultaneously. I have a portfolio like the gentleman does with some money on either side of that ledger.

I am a homeowner. I have mortgage interests. I have credit card interest and at the same time I have savings accounts; so all of us are in the borrowing and lending market constantly.

Six dollars less in my pocket means, other things being equal, that I will let my charge card run up $6 more, for which there is an 18-percent interest charge.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Well, if the gentleman will yield further, I hope the average American does not do it that way, because it is cheaper to pay as you go and I think people do on most of their major expenditures.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, if I could reclaim my time just to conclude, my argument is that under the terms of H.R. 555, the ratepayer is going to have rate shock of perhaps 30 percent or more when that plant comes on line because that is when all the costs, not only the construction costs, but all the interest costs are put into the rate base and you are going to pay more.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this issue has a number of different facets to it; but I think the one the gentleman has just discussed may be a very important one. If the automotive industry were to come to us as we were finishing high school and said to you that during your lifetime you may use 5 or even 10 cars, we would like to start billing you for the iron ore that is coming out of the mines at this point, just in case you are going to need them, and we are going to start building them at some point and we are going to put that on your MasterCharge or your Visa; but we are going to start charging you today for the lumber we are growing, because some day you are going to need a home and you are going to need those trees.

What is going to happen is that everybody is going to come to us next. We are going to have the people who make clothing goods come to us and want to pay for the machinery because it will be cheaper for us to buy that suit that we are going to buy 20 years from now if they do not have to borrow the money to build the machinery that harvests the cotton and the wool and everything else.

It is a great argument, but what we have here is an industry that has traditionally had some balance between regulation and private sector control on how much generation is necessary. Even under those circumstances, it has been a very difficult decision making progress for the most responsible of utility executives.

Taking a look at the period of time we have just come through, one of the most turmoiled times in energy consumption in the history of the world, possibly, from 1970 to 1984, with the best estimates, even after the first energy crisis, we have overestimated the increase for demand of electricity.

What happens when you take that very responsible head of a utility and you give him an incentive to build? As we take a look at the choices of having more efficient appliances, of energy conservation, of buying energy from garbage to steam to electric energy facilities, how does that impact us as a country? If you put in the smallest incentive for building new generating facilities over the next 20 years you will add in excess of a trillion dollars to the cost of generating electricity.

Do you know what a trillion dollars means? It means that every product that is made in this country is less competitive when you try to export it.

What this proposal by FERC and the gentleman's amendment will do is make us more dependent on generating more energy.

Government and industry have been in a very tenuous relationship in this case. From 1898 in the first Supreme Court review, the Government has held that what is used and useful will be paid for by the consumers. And the companies, as all companies have to do when they are dealing with amassing capital, have to go out to the private marketplace and convince the private sector that there is a need for that new facility.

What this does is it takes that decisionmaking process and skews it, not entirely, but certainly skews it in a very significant way to building new generating facilities. That will make it less competitive for American industry, it will make it more expensive for Americans to buy the energy they need.

When you come to certain categories of people, it affects them most adversely. Senior citizens who are living in oftentimes very difficult economic situations are being forced to pay for electricity that they may never see and they may never live to see delivered.

So now you are going to force them in Washington State, in that area where WPPSS is now in trouble, to pay for three or four utility plants that will never be completed and no one may ever see any benefit from.

We need to infuse in the decisionmaking process of the utility executives some aspect of reality, that there is a danger to building new facilities and new transmission plants and not an incentive to gold-plate the entire process.

If we want to see the process move forward, the existing legislation that is before the House today does that. It protects companies that are in dire financial straits, that can prove that they need new generating facilities, and in that case we provide them construction work in progress.

If you do not want to let the company make the decision then have it go to the private sector to get the resources. However, if the consumers are going to be prebilled for the plant, then let them make the profit off the plant. Do not tax the consumers of electricity in this country and then give the profits to the stockholders. If the stockholders want to make the profits, then the stockholders ought to take the risk.

Finally, and I will finish with this point, what we will see in America if the amendment passes and the FERC rule stays in place is separate holding companies created by existing utilities that will separate their generating facilities from their distribution companies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GEJDENSON) has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. GEJDENSON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GEJDENSON. They will separate the generating facilities from their transmission and service facilities and they will not even need to go to State regulatory agencies. They will be able to prebill for construction work in progress.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEJDENSON. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman's questions.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Is it not true that there is no way, if we do not put the plant into operation, that they can recover their original investment, their principal, or the 50-percent of the interest rate that they have already paid? There is no benefit to the stockholders whatsoever from that.

Mr. GEJDENSON. If Mr. Iacoca makes a product that I like and I need, then I will pay for it gladly. If for the factory he has completed he borrows the money to build that factory, he sells me one of his new cars, I buy that car and I pay for the cost of borrowing money to build that factory.

What I do not want to do is give Mr. Iacoca, unless he is in trouble, and when he was in trouble the Federal taxpayers did subsidize him, but when he is not in trouble I want him to go to the free marketplace to get the money to borrow to build that manufacturing facility. Then I will make a decision whether or not to buy.

Mr. MOORHEAD. If the gentleman will yield further, you pay for the R&D on the next model of Mr. Iacoca's cars when you buy this year's model.

Mr. GEJDENSON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MOORHEAD. You are doing exactly the same thing.

Mr. GEJDENSON. When I pay my utility bill, I provide the profit in that. The company is not simply recovering operating costs. I pay a profit which the utilities' regulatory agencies have given the utilities and which makes them attractive to investors so that they can go out and get additional revenue to build new generating facilities and transmission lines.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I would point out, if the gentleman will yield further, that while the wholesale prices will continue to be controlled by the agency, in other words CWIP is not automatic, they have to apply, they have to prove that the plant is necessary before they get it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GEJDENSON) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. MOORHEAD and by unanimous consent Mr. GEJDENSON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MOORHEAD. Then if they get it, the public utility commissions in each and every State have to make the determination of the prices that the utility companies in the States can charge for their retail products.

Mr. GEJDENSON. If the gentleman will examine the way the State utility regulatory agencies make their decisions, there is no agency in any of the 50 States that could disallow in the rate base a consideration for something that FERC approved for a utility. They would have them in court in 15 minutes and throw that decision out. Anybody who has watched utility regulation can understand that.

The fundamental issue here, even beyond the recovery of the actual costs, is the question of whether or not you build. You have a society and a utility which is taking a look at realistic options in the marketplace, and to what gives them a better chance to serve their customers, and State regulators have an opportunity to weigh that decision, or do you skew the process into just building.

What I am saying is if they have an option that is subsidized for building, then a responsible utility president will opt for building.

Mr. MOORHEAD. If the gentleman will yield further, the rates will automatically go up higher and higher and higher if you have a disincentive for the utility companies to take the logical course of action and provide the energy for America in the future.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Let us examine, then, recent history. If you take a look at recent history, even the post-1973 energy crisis, as we have tried to peg the demand for new energy, in each instance the utilities and even the Government has overestimated the need for new generating facilities. We have in this instance overbuilt significantly the necessary generating facilities.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, throughout the debate on H.R. 555, both in committee and on the floor, I have been struck by the uncertainty which permeates every estimate and every discussion of future electricity demand in the United States. Despite our best efforts, it is simply impossible to accurately predict how fast our economy will grow or what will happen to the price of a barrel of crude oil or what new technologies may be developed to improve our ability to conserve energy and to utilize renewable sources of energy.

If we cannot know the future, with certainty, then I think we are obligated to adopt a public policy which takes into account every reasonable possibility. To put it another way, we should not be passing laws which could have the effect of precluding the creation of any job or preventing the growth of our economy. I know this is not the intent of H.R. 555, but I believe that it may be the actual effect.

I recently received a copy of a report from an organization in Indiana called Hoosiers for Economic Development. The report is entitled "A Perspective on Future Electric Power Supply and Demand for the State of Indiana" and draws the following troublesome conclusion: Based on past trends in electric power usage and projections in demand growth of between 2.4 and 3.1 percent annually, Indiana could be facing electric power shortages as early as 1993. I should point out that the Hoosiers for Economic Development committee is an educational organization of 15,000 members looking at issues that affect long-range economic development in the State of Indiana. The leadership of this organization is made up of many distinguished and knowledgeable individuals including bank presidents, corporate executives, agricultural experts, and the former senior Senator from Indiana Birch Bayh. If the conclusions of this report are conceivable, which I believe they are, then we must be very careful in raising new regulatory barriers to the development of new electric generating capacity. For my constituents it means nothing less than the opportunity to have a good job and a comfortable standard of living.

Perhaps an analogy to the natural gas industry would help to explain the serious flaws in H.R. 555. As we are all well aware, the problems in the natural gas industry; that is, rising prices in the face of falling demand, are largely the result of a regulatory scheme which has insulated producers from signals in the market place. The very best example of this is the Algerian liquified natural gas that was forced upon consumers in my State and in other States at prices well above the market. While the situation has improved some—at least the Algerian gas has been stopped—serious damage has been done and markets have not yet begun to recover from the imbalances perpetuated by the Natural Gas Policy Act.

I believe H.R. 555 creates a similar danger by insulating consumers from the actual costs of generating electricity. As we have seen in the past, consumers can be hit by "rate shock" when a new generating facility is put online. H.R. 555, by narrowly restricting the applicability of CWIP, could actually discourage conservation and make it more difficult for utilities and other energy planners to gage future energy demand.

I agree with the supporters of H.R. 555 that CWIP should not be available to utilities without restriction or qualification. To this point, there are some well-worn facts which bear repeating. First of all, we should not forget that the FERC rule, which is the basis for the pending amendment, affects only 8 to 10 percent of all sales of electricity by privately owned electric companies in the United States. In other words, 90 percent of electricity sales will continue to be regulated by State authorities and State public utility commissions. The FERC rule will in no way affect the State's authority to regulate electric power. In fact, the legislature of my State of Indiana has clearly spoken on this issue and this bill will in no way affect their decision.

It also is important to note that the FERC rule does not allow all of CWIP to be placed in the utility's rate base. Instead, it allows only up to 50 percent of CWIP to be put in the rate base and, as an added protection, consumer rates will be allowed to increase no more than 6 percent per year, for the first years. In addition, the FERC rule places additional safeguards to protect the consumers from unwarranted rate increases.

Finally, it should be noted that the FERC rule was developed over a period of several years with numerous opportunities for public comment. On the other hand, H.R. 555 was the subject of only 1 day of hearings in this Congress. Even if we in the Congress were qualified to decide these issues, we would still have to defer to the extensive work of the FERC.

As Federal legislators looking at the future demand for electricity, I think we have two responsibilities. First, we must be sure that our energy resources are reasonably priced and that utilities are responsive to consumer demand. Second, we must be concerned that adequate reserves of energy are available for the future. I believe that Mr. MOORHEAD's amendment goes further toward striking this critical balance than H.R. 555.

□ 1730

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment on several grounds. We should not codify the recent FERC rule which has the effect of adding CWIP charges on to consumers' backs.

The question before us is why should CWIP be restrained and discouraged? The first reason is the cost of borrowing. As was developed earlier in the colloquy between myself and the gentleman from North Carolina, the cost of borrowing is much higher for the consumer than for the utility. If we force the financing costs now on to the backs of the consumer for a project he does not have any benefit of until later, rather than asking the utility to use its great borrowing power to borrow that same money, the financing costs are much higher. The risk that I have to face when I go to the capital market is much higher and therefore the interest charges on any money I must borrow to pay any daily costs such as my credit cards or in any other way to finance my way through a current period, is much higher by at least that, that which a utility must pay.

Therefore, if we have the consumers do the financing rather than the utility, the financing cost, the total financing cost is substantially higher and that is bad.

Second, as has been pointed out there is an intergenerational equity concern here. Many people will be asked to pay charges for utilities now that they will never receive the benefit of because they are older, they are in the last years of their lives and we are saddling older people with financing costs for projects they will never receive benefit from.

Of course it is also true that people will pay financing costs for projects that they will not benefit from because they will be living elsewhere.

The average American family moves every 5 years. So there is another inequity which is built in.

But the most serious reason why we should not encourage CWIP, why we should discourage and restrain it wherever possible, has to do with the issue of abandoned projects. I speak with some knowledge on this because in Wisconsin we have two extremely expensive projects which have been abandoned after running up enormous bills.

The first is the Haven nuclear project which was abandoned because it turned out to be ill-considered, ill-advised project, and has cost the consumer $17 million in extra finance charges they would not have had to bear.

The Tyrone coal-powered electric project has cost the consumers $22 million in finance charges they should never have had to bear.

The consumers were not in on the making of the decision to have those projects. Nonetheless they have to bear the costs of the mistakes.

Why is that bad? Why is it bad to have that happen?

First of all it is obviously unfair, it is inequitable to force consumers to pay for something they never receive the benefit of.

Second, it promotes risk taking that really should not be. It encourages heavy capital, higher risk projects than would otherwise be undertaken.

When the decisionmakers, who have the equity position in the project, can transfer the risk of the failure of that project, the abandonment, eventually, of that project on to someone else, they obviously are going to be more inclined to take that risk and that is exactly what happened in Wisconsin because CWIP'ing was permitted.

We have $39 million of extra finance charges directly on the backs of the consumer in Wisconsin because those risks were ill-advisedly taken.

No. 2 within that reason which I mentioned is that it encourages heavy capital projects. Because we are artificially lowering the equity cost of any given project by removing the shareholders of the utility from the loss or abandonment of that project, by artificially lowering the finance costs and the equity financing costs as well as the borrowing finance cost of a project, we are encouraging projects that are heavier in capital needs relative to other projects.

This has led to more nuclear facilities being undertaken in Wisconsin than would otherwise be the case. Someone said earlier that this would preclude, this would discourage utilities from engaging in alternative forms of energy. Alternative forms of energy normally are much less capital intensive than nuclear.

The CWIP'ing in Wisconsin has lead to, in the judgment of informed observers, to more nuclear projects and more heavy projects, including nuclear, than would otherwise be the case. In other words, it leads directly to excessive building.

□ 1740

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. MOODY) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MOODY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MOODY. As for the question of rate shock, yes, rates will eventually go up when the project is completed, if it is completed. And the financial charges are then clicked in.

But this is entirely appropriate. It is entirely appropriate that the rates go up at the right time. And for those Members who are so worried about rate shock I suggest you vote for taxes in 1984 to prevent tax shock in 1985, because an exactly analogous situation obtains.

Most of the consumers that I represent would rather pay their fair share when it is time to pay their fair share than frontload financing costs for projects they may not enjoy and for which the financing costs are much higher if they have to pay the frontload than if they eventually have to pick up the so-called rate shock at the appropriate time.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOODY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. WEAVER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman mentioned CWIP'ing in Wisconsin. I wondered if the State of Wisconsin had a penalty for CWIP'ing. Fifteen yards, possibly.

Mr. MOODY. No; the State of Wisconsin, fortunately, in 1971, through administrative procedure, our Public Service Commission began to permit CWIP'ing. We did not permit it before then. And since that time there has been a distinct twisting of financial decisions toward heavier capital projects, including two that I mentioned, which have had the unfortunate effect of loading heavy finance costs onto the backs of consumers, rather than onto the equity shareholders of the utility.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOODY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman may be speaking about a situation that was true in Wisconsin, but there is nothing in this rule or nothing in my amendment whatsoever that would allow the recovery for an abandoned project. That would fall on the backs of the investors and the company that was investing. There is nothing here that would allow that recovery.

Mr. MOODY. I appreciate the gentleman's comment.

However, I would observe that if CWIP'ing is going on and the project is subsequently abandoned later, then those consumers have in fact been paying finance charges which they should not have been having to pay.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the discussion that we have been having here, I think, has been an extremely useful debate on the merits or lack thereof of CWIP, but I would not want my colleagues to think that if some of them, like me, are people who do not find CWIP necessarily an inappropriate way of paying for projects that they should automatically therefor vote for the substitute or against the bill. I think quite the contrary is true.

We permit CWIP's in my State and I have always felt that the argument that you pay for it now or you pay for it later has some merit.

A CWIP, however, I think even though the most enthusiastic supporter of CWIP's would be willing to agree, it can be abused. Any good tool can be abused. If you set aside for a moment whatever our respective views may be, pro or con, on CWIP, I think we can all agree you do not want to abuse CWIP. And if my colleagues will take a look at what this bill does, you will find that all in the world it does is build some guidelines so that CWIP can be used where it is appropriate and so it cannot be abused.

The testimony before the committee was that some utilities simply were not able to have sufficient cash flow to build certain kinds of projects. Testimony was that they were not able to borrow money at rates that were equal to other utilities in some instances. The testimony was that therefore they were not able to build needed facilities.

What does H.R. 555 do? It says you may have a CWIP on a case-by-case basis if you can simply demonstrate you have insufficient cash flow, that you cannot get your loans at rates that are equal to what others do, and if you can demonstrate that you have a facility that needs to be built and cannot be met by conservation or some other manner such as that.

People who support CWIP can and should support this bill to be sure that a valuable tool is used properly and not abused.

I think that the substitute that is being offered should be voted down. Those who are extremely leary of CWIP's should certainly support H.R. 555 and those who support CWIP's as a tool that should be used properly and not abused should vote for H.R. 555.

PERFECTING AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BETHUNE

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Perfecting amendment offered by Mr. BETHUNE: Page 12, after line 8, insert:

CERTAIN RATE INCREASES

SEC. 5. (a) Section 205 of the Federal Power Act is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(g) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section or section 206—

"(1) if, in any calendar year, a public utility (or a pool or group of utilities) files with the Commission an increase in the rates or charges for the transmission or sale of electric energy, such increased rates or charges may not take effect prior to the date one year after the date of such filing unless each State regulatory authority which regulates the retail rates of each purchasing utility which purchases such electric energy certifies to the Commission that that such increase (together with all other increases in rates or charges for the sale or transmission of electric energy by such public utility or pool or group to the purchasing utility which take effect in the same calendar year) will not exceed by more than 20 percent the rates or charges which would have applied to such transmission or sale under schedules in effect on the last day of the calendar year immediately preceding the calendar year in which such increased rates or charges are filed; and

"(2) if, in any calendar year, the Commission approves or adopts an increase in the rates or charges for the transmission or sale of electric energy by a public utility (or a pool or group of utilities), such increased rates or charges may not take effect prior to the date one year after the date of approval or adoption unless each State regulatory authority which regulates the retail rates of each purchasing utility which purchases such electric energy certifies to the Commission that such increase (together with all other increases in rates or charges for the sale or transmission of electric energy by such public utility or pool or group to the purchasing utility which take effect in the same calendar year) will not exceed by more than 20 percent the rates or charges which would have applied to such transmission or sale under schedules in effect on the last day of the calendar year immediately preceding the calendar year in which such increased rates or charges are approved or adopted by the Commission.".

(b) Subsection (g)(1) of section 205 of the Federal Power Act shall take effect with respect to rates or charges filed with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission after the date of the enactment of this Act. Subsection (g)(2) of section 205 of the Federal Power Act shall take effect with respect to rates or charges approved or adopted by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission after the date of the enactment of this Act.

Mr. BETHUNE (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Chairman, I will not take too much time of my colleagues here, but inasmuch as we are discussing today the question of utility rates and actions by FERC, I thought it would be an appropriate time to raise a point that is of great concern to the people of my State and other States in the South.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, as has been demonstrated by the rule that they propose here, can very frequently get ahead of itself and do things that have devastating impact on the consumers.

I am in support of the gentleman from New York's position on the bill that is on the floor here today. As I was opposed to the Alaska natural gas pipeline bill for the same reason in that it permits cost of construction to be passed on to the consumers before the construction is completed. And I think that is a burden that the investors ought to bear.

The point that I make in my amendment that I offer today is that I think it is presumptively unfair any time FERC takes an action that would result in an increase of cost to the consumers of any State in this country in excess of 20 percent. And we are faced with that prospect in my State now that an action by FERC may do just that.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BETHUNE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OTTINGER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to say that I understand the gentleman's concern. We are aware of the situation of the FERC rate increases as they affect the consumers in Arkansas and neighboring States.

And we will be happy to pursue that subject in our subcommittee forthwith.

The amendment offered by the gentleman I believe is out of order because it goes beyond the scope of this legislation. The legislation deals only generally with inclusion of construction work in progress in the rate base in the extent and under the conditions under which it will be included, not an actual rate action by the Commission.

If the gentleman would agree to withdraw his amendment, we can assure him that we will look into his concerns.

Mr. BETHUNE. I thank the chairman for making that point.

I wonder if the ranking minority member would engage in this colloquy as well because I think that certainly the people in my State would appreciate knowing that we have the consensus of both sides of the aisle that this is a problem that needs tending to and we would certainly like to have that assurance.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BETHUNE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MOORHEAD. We of course want to work with the gentleman and try to work the problem out.

Mr. BETHUNE. I thank the gentleman. And I would hope that in the course of working with the committee that should this particular approach not be the one that would reach the problem that we have that we could come up with some other approach that would work in this instance.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad we are having the opportunity today to discuss some of the actions of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC). I, for one, do not understand whose best interests the FERC had in mind when they ruled that utilities could charge ratepayers for construction work in progress. It certainly is not in the best interest of the ratepayer.

It seems to me that a disturbing trend is developing across this country. Big business—including utilities—are coming to the Federal Government to ask for Government assistance. Sometimes it is in the form of Government loans and loan guarantees. In this case, they have asked that the Federal Government help insure that their energy plant construction costs are covered. But not by investors, who stand to gain a great deal from their investment in a powerplant. They have asked that utility ratepayers pay for construction of power plants. Ratepayers who may or may not ever use that energy.

If this trend continues, pretty soon we will not even need the private investor. The utility can just come straight to the Federal Government and say they have been thinking about building a new nuclear or coal-fired plant, and could they have the ratepayers start paying now so they can get the plans drawn up.

Under the FERC ruling, it does not seem to matter whether or not the energy is needed, or whether or not the plant will ever be completed. My concern is that if the private investors are hesitant to put their money behind a new powerplant and need to know that the ratepayer will soon be backing up their investment, then maybe the utility needs to take a second look at how necessary this plant is.

We have seen this all before. Just a couple of years ago the backers of the Alaska Natural Gas Pipeline were here asking the ratepayers to bail them out. And we have always had a problem trying to get private investors for the Clinch River Breeder Reactor.

Right now, people in my State of Arkansas are being asked to help pay for new nuclear power in Louisiana and Mississippi. It does not seem to matter to the FERC that Arkansas does not need or want this power. But apparently, the utilities cannot find anyone else who wants or needs this power either.

So they have turned to the Federal Government. I do not think that is the right place to turn. It is time the utilities were responsible for their own decisions. H.R. 555 is a good start.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. BETHUNE)?

There was no objection.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act because it protects consumers from unnecessary rate increases and prevents the transfer of investment risk from stockholder to ratepayer. Asking consumers to pay up front for long-term capital investment projects from which they may never benefit is unfair.

In 1983, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission relaxed its rule concerning CWIP to allow any utility, even those in a strong financial position, to include half of the cost of financing a powerplant, while still under construction, in its federally regulated rate base. In essence, the FERC gave a green light to utilities to expand and pass half of their investment costs on to captive consumers. H.R. 555 prevents this inequity.

H.R. 555 provides consumer protection against unnecessary rate increases by restricting the inclusion of all costs of CWIP in rate bases regulated by the FERC to situations in which a utility has cash flow below 40 percent of expenditures and can only borrow money at rates significantly higher than the industry average. Without this protection, low-income consumers and those on fixed incomes would be providing partial financing for utility investments.

As it stands now, the FERC rule encourages expansion rather than conservation. This is irresponsible and wasteful. H.R. 555 would require a utility to prove that the facility it wants to build is necessary and that alternatives such as cogeneration or conservation are economically unviable. This is a responsible and prudent approach to energy and economic efficiency.

H.R. 555 is supported by the Consumer Federation of America, the Sierra Club, the American Association of Retired Persons, the American Public Power Association, the United Auto Workers, and the United Steel Workers of America. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this important consumer legislation.

□ 1750

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a long debate on this amendment and we have heard all kinds of statements about what the amendment does and what it does not do.

RESPONSE TO ABANDONED PLANT CONCERN

Proponents of H.R. 555 would have us believe that the rule so carefully fashioned by FERC would transfer the financial risks associated with cancellation of construction projects from shareholders to ratepayers. This is not true. The rate treatment of abandoned construction projects is not affected by this rule. Rather, the rate treatment of canceled plants is the subject of an extensive body of existing law which focuses on the prudency of management's decision to undertake the project and equitable risk sharing. FERC retains its full authority to refund all CWIP payments to the ratepayer in instances where such payments are determined to be in anyway unreasonable or improper.

RESPONSE TO "DOUBLE-WHAMMY" CONCERN

Proponents of H.R. 555 have expressed concern that including 50 percent of the financing costs for CWIP in utilities' rate base is somehow unfair to wholesale consumers who are building their own plant. They inaccurately argue that the FERC rule will unfairly require them to pay for another utility's future generating capacity at the same time they are building their own plant.

Nothing can be farther from the truth. First, there are very few wholesale customers who are either building or planning to build enough capacity to become entirely self-sufficent. To the extent wholesale customers must continue to purchase electricity, they are contributing to the electric load that the other utilities must satisfy and should be treated as any other customer. Second, FERC has recently changed its policy to protect the wholesale customer who will become self-sufficient. Wholesale customers can escape liability for charges attributable to CWIP once they have demonstrated that they bear no responsibility for the decision to build a new plant and will, in fact, purchase no power from the new plant.

RESPONSE TO CONCERN ABOUT ELDERLY PAYING FOR PLANTS THEY MAY NEVER BE SERVED BY

Proponents of H.R. 555 continually raise the elderly and the fact that they may never be served by investments in future capacity as an argument against the FERC rule. I have now listened to this argument several times, and today I feel I must respond. First, I should point out, there are no guarantees that any of us will be around to enjoy the benefits of our investments. Second, I resent the inference that our senior citizens are any less patriotic and any less concerned about this Nation's future than the rest of us.

What we are talking about today is one of the significant financial disincentives impeding the development of the necessary generating capacity vital to our industrial base and economic prosperity. There is reason for grave concern about the electric power industry's willingness and ability to undertake future capital projects. Our senior citizens share in all of our desire to bequeath the next generation an adequate and secure source of electricity.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that in a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission he pointed out that the final rule in order No. 298 represents years of experience dealing with the cost of financing utility plant as it impacts wholesale electric rates. He said:

I believe it is a judicious reform of the anomalous practice of excluding from rate base the cost of financing ongoing construction programs. Not only did the "financial distress" test for CWIP, which was abandoned by the Commission, afford the industry little assistance in a time of economic hardship and stop-gap regulatory policies, it did not enable utilities to prepare to meet the demands of the future.

He further said:

To date, twelve rate cases involving CWIP have been filed under the new rule. As these and future cases are addressed by the Commission, the Congress and the public will be able to ascertain more clearly whether the Commission's approach is equitable and economically viable. The Congress may wish to benefit from the Commission's experience under the new rule before requiring so radical a reversal of Commission ratemaking policy.

I would point out, in closing, that this Commission is set up to protect the consumer. They are not in line with the industry. They want to protect the consumer, they want to protect all of us. We are overruling their regulation if we pass H.R. 555 without even seeing how it would work.

I ask for an aye vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORHEAD) there were—ayes 6, noes 10.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 135, noes 266, not voting 32, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. McCain for, with Mr. Minish against.

Mr. Corcoran for, with Mr. Coughlin against.

Mr. HORTON and Mr. SAWYER changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Mr. HIGHTOWER and Mr. BURTON of Indiana changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, for those colleagues who share my belief that one of Congress roles is to be an advocate for the consumer, we have today an unequivocal opportunity to exercise that responsibility.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) reversed regulatory policy of nearly 100 years when it decided last July to automatically permit electric utilities to pass along to ratepayers the financing costs of new power facilities under construction. The Construction Work in Progress Policy Act (H.R. 555) is a responsible effort to overturn this unwarranted policy switch. FERC's new order demonstrates an astounding lack of sensitivity toward American consumers saddled with ever-increasing electricity bills at the end of each month.

The American Public Power Association, a national organization representing more than 1,750 local, publicly owned utilities, accurately summed up the issue when it asked:

At a time when electric bills are rising and demand is declining, should consumers bear the immediate cost and risk of generating plants that are not supplying electricity and may never be needed?

The appropriate answer is, of course, "No." Especially when one ponders the tremendous burden construction work in progress (CWIP) charges will hand to consumers who have already absorbed rate increases of 70 percent during the last 5 years. When fully implemented, according to one estimate, the new rule will raise electric rates assessed by utilities purchasing wholesale electric power by $750 million.

Both the consumer and the electricity-generating industry will suffer if FERC's rule is allowed to stand. CWIP charges shift part of the financial risk of constructing facilities from shareholder to ratepayer, weakening the incentive for sound utility management. Instead of inspiring utilities to obtain needed capacity through least-cost methods such as conservation, load management, or alternate energy resources, FERC is encouraging utilities to build additional large and expensive powerplants. Consumers are forced to pay in advance for generating capacity for which there may be no need and from which they may never benefit.

Nonetheless, the policy embodied in H.R. 555 does not abandon utilities able to demonstrate they require extraordinary rate relief. Longstanding Federal policy directing FERC to scrutinize CWIP requests on a case-by-case basis would be restored, guaranteeing genuinely neeedy electric companies a safety net.

The importance of this vote, though it will affect only a relatively small portion of overall electricity sales, should not be underestimated. Many States prohibit or restrict CWIP charges in the retail sale of electricity; H.R. 555, if passed by Congress, would serve as a precedent for many State public service commissions debating whether to adopt similar limitations, or to review existing ones.

In liberalizing the use of construction work in progress, FERC has rewarded an industry without requiring sufficient proof of need. Once again, as it has had to do with regularity under President Reagan's leadership, the Congress must intervene and represent the consumer's position in Federal policymaking. Let us do our job.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, the inclusion of construction work in progress costs in wholesale rate bases has always been a complex and controversial issue. When the House considered the authorization bill for the Alaskan natural gas pipeline, I favored allowing some of the costs of the project to be passed on to consumers. This was a unique situation when the importance of the project merited requiring consumers to share the risk. However, we were very careful to insure that consumers bore only a small portion of the risk and the private sector assumed the greater financial risk.

Today we address the broader question of allowing construction work in progress costs in a utility's rate base as a general rule. I believe the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) rule that allows up to 50 percent of the costs of construction work in progress to be included in rate bases went too far. The future electricity demand in this country is uncertain. Conservation measures have already cut down on our electricity needs and we have only begun our efforts for more efficient use of our energy supplies. If we allow the FERC ruling to stand, consumers may be charged for constructing facilities that may never be used.

H.R. 555 is a fair compromise to the CWIP controversy. The bill does not prohibit the inclusion of construction work in progress in wholesale rate bases, but rather limits the circumstances under which it can be used. H.R. 555 is good financial policy, good energy policy, and good consumer policy.●

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act.

As one who believes that the use of CWIP may often be more beneficial to the consumer than AFUDC, I originally approached H.R. 555 with a certain degree of trepidation. However, upon close examination of both the bill, the committee report, the recent FERC ruling on this subject and a variety of related material, I find that the Committee on Energy and Commerce has indeed fashioned a fair and reasonable approach to the often controversial issue of CWIP use by electric utilities.

The major difference between CWIP and AFUDC is not whether the utility's customers will pay for the new facility, but rather, at which point its customers start paying. It should be noted that in this debate we are discussing the use of CWIP in wholesale power transactions, which account for only 10.8 percent of total revenue from sales of electricity, an area which falls under the jurisdiction of FERC.

There are two major reasons why I support H.R. 555. First, it retains the current FERC policy of allowing 100 percent CWIP for the construction of pollution control facilities and for conversions from oil or gas to coal. As such, our national policy of increasing the use of coal in an environmentally sound manner is not hindered by this bill.

Second, I support H.R. 555 over the 1983 FERC ruling because this legislation treats the inclusion of CWIP on a case-by-case basis. This provision is especially important, and is exemplified by three names: Marble Hill, Byron, and Zimmer. These are the names of three nuclear powerplants which were recently abandoned in their construction stages. If these plants had been allowed the use of CWIP, the risk of nuclear powerplant construction would have been transferred from the utilities' shareholders to the ratepayer who would have been penalized for management decisions which he had not participated in.

As such, I find the provision of H.R. 555, which mandates a finding of whether a new facility represents the least costly method of meeting electricity demand prior to allowing CWIP, of special importance. Under this criteria, it would appear that in most instances the use of CWIP would be prohibited for nuclear powerplants since coal-fired electrical generation is clearly more economical in terms of construction costs and operation and maintenance.

A recent study conducted by the Worldwatch Institute entitled, "Nuclear Power: The Market Test," states that new coal-fired powerplants are less expensive to build than new nuclear powerplants—even if all of the safety and health dangers of nuclear power are not considered.

However, it was those very safety issues which recently led to the denial of an operating license to a nearly completed $3.35 billion nuclear powerplant in Illinois, and contributed to the abandonment of a 97-percent completed $1.6 billion nuclear powerplant in Ohio and a half completed $2.5 billion nuclear facility in Indiana.

According to the Worldwatch study, there are 30-odd nuclear plants scheduled for completion during this decade; other sources place this figure at 48 plants. With a lifetime generating cost of between 0.10 and 0.12 per kilowatt hour, 1982 dollars, these plants will cost 65 percent more than that of a new coal-fired powerplant.

The Worldwatch study added:

> If all the electricity used by Americans cost as much as this nuclear electricity will, the nation's utility bills would rise about 130 percent. As a source of heat, electricity from new nuclear plants at today's delivered cost compares with oil priced at $240 per barrel.

Time magazine, in this week's cover story, reports that according to Charles Komanoff, of Komanoff Energy Consultants of New York City, a coal-fired powerplant with state-of-the-art pollution control equipment can be constructed for around $1,200 per kilowatt hour compared to nuclear plants which cost $3,000 per kilowatt hour.

The future of electrical generation certainly appears to lie with coal. According to an OTA study released this week, "Nuclear Power in an Age of Uncertainty," even if regulatory policies were changed to favor nuclear powerplant construction, "smaller coal-fired powerplants would be preferred because they have shorter leadtimes, lower financial risk, and greater public acceptance than current nuclear designs."

As such, I believe the provisions of H.R. 555 will do great service to utilities engaged in the construction of coal-fired powerplants. This type of electrical generation is clearly more favorable to the consumer.●

● Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, as a cosponsor of H.R. 555, I rise to express my support of this much needed legislation. At a time when electric bills are escalating and demand is declining, consumers have no business bearing the cost of generating plants which have yet to be completely constructed and may never be needed.

What causes me the greatest concern is the argument put forth by those who believe that electric utilities should be allowed to routinely pass on to the ratepayers 50 percent of the financing charges on the cost of new powerplants. Supposedly those arguments are based on the premise that such action is being carried out in the best interest of the "unsuspecting" consumer. That could not be farther from the truth.

The truth of the matter is that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) reversed a longstanding regulatory policy which required that customers not pay until a plant is actually producing electricity. Such an ill-conceived rule flies clearly in the face of commonsense. It only creates unnecessary burdens on consumers who may not even be around to enjoy the electricity generated. It also tends to promote the construction of larger powerplants when their need is questionable, and blatantly ignore the need to explore and utilize less costly measures of meeting electric energy needs.

By supporting passage of H.R. 555, my colleagues will be correcting an inequity of a rule that has the potential to raise electric rates for consumers of utilities who purchase wholesale electric power by $750 million.

Allowing FERC to permit construction work in progress. on a case-by-case determination adheres to a policy of keeping it as an extraordinary form of rate relief.●

● Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 555, as reported by the Energy and Commerce Committee and urge the House to favorably consider this vital utility policy legislation.

Many Members who are supporters of this legislation were concerned with construction work in progress (CWIP) long before the current FERC rule was adopted. For myself, my authorship of Minnesota's utility regulation law in the mid-1970's, while serving in the Minnesota Legislature, gave me the opportunity to become familiar with all aspects of the CWIP issue. I became convinced that CWIP was a bad deal for utility customers then and remains so today.

The CWIP policy established by FERC is really an abrogation of public accountability. FERC's new rule will routinely allow wholesale customers to be billed for 50 percent of the financing charges during construction, with no real accountability as to the prudency or reasonableness of those charges. What this policy would do is further insulate utilities and their investors from being accountable for bad business decisions. CWIP is really a matter of shifting risk from the investor to the utility customer, with no assurance to utility customers that they will ever gain any benefit.

While the present FERC rule only deals with wholesale power, its policy and practical implications are far broader. For instance, wholesale rates will be forced up, while retail rates, which are under State utility regulation, will not reflect CWIP charges. This policy distortion creates an economic inequity and is a subtle but definite push to State utility regulators to include CWIP at the State level. If the FERC CWIP policy is left unchallenged, I can foresee utilities' running to State commissions and urging the adoption of CWIP into retail rates to reflect the Federal policy.

The historical used and useful principle has served well in protecting the public from imprudent or unnecessary charges or add-ons in powerplant construction. Just look at American commerce, the used and useful principle is the basis on which most business transactions are conducted in this country. H.R. 555 recognizes that in certain unique instances that there needs to be exception to this norm. H.R. 555 crafts a public policy that distinguishes those certain cases in which an up-front infusion or consumer funds may be necessary to supply needed electrical capacity, from those instances where a utility and its investors are more than adequately capable to finance their construction plans.

I believe H.R. 555 is vital consumer legislation and urge its adoption.●

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act (CWIP), and in opposition to the amendment to strike all provisions of H.R. 555 and replace them with the current FERC rule on CWIP.

Mr. Chairman, the bill before us is a good one. It encourages responsible planning by utilities in order to avoid unnecessarily high utility rates for consumers. The CWIP method of setting rates transfers the burden of investment in new plant construction from shareholders to ratepayers. It also relieves utility decisionmakers from the discipline of the marketplace by alleviating risk. This is accomplished by allowing utilities, regardless of need, to set its rates by charging customers for the financing of new plants. This is inherently bad policy, and one that does not merit our support.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 555 as reported by the Energy and Commerce Committee, and to defeat weakening amendments.●

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 555. I believe that the entire concept of billing electric customers for construction work in progress (CWIP) raises very serious questions of the role of investment and risk capital in our free enterprise system, particularly with respect to investor-owned utilities.

Although the measure before us today deals only with the Federal Government's role in CWIP, as administered by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, there is concern that the liberal FERC rule now in effect could serve as a model that will be quickly adopted and utilized by the various State regulatory commissions.

If CWIP does come into widespread use, utilities will no longer have to convince skeptical investors on the wisdom of plant construction. Instead, the burden will fall upon the consumer who will find the expense tacked on to his monthly electric bill, and will never have had any voice in the decision.

According to theory, in a free enterprise system, a business or individual must develop a proposal which will win the confidence of investors. If the proposal is well conceived and well executed, the investors can expect to enjoy a return on their investment. If it was not such a good idea or it was not carried out very well, then the investor must accept the consequences of a bad decision.

Over the years, that has basically been the system in effect for investor owned utilities with plans for new plant construction. All of us who hold public office have heard the gripes of consumers who are concerned about electric rate increases. In reply we have heard the pleas of utilities which claim that they must be able to provide a sufficient rate of return—that high dividends are essential to attract the investment that is needed to build new plants to meet basic customer demand.

Unfortunately, we have already moved away from that concept and increasingly find it is the consumer who is left holding the bag for bad decisions. Even now, in my southern New Jersey Congressional District, electric customers are paying for four floating nuclear plants that were never built and should have never been built. The idea of putting nuclear powerplants on barges floating in the ocean was dubious from the very beginning. The electric customers in my region are also paying for the local utility company's share of the canceled Hope Creek 2 nuclear power station.

Those are losses that should have been borne by the shareholders or other investors—but they are not. They are being paid for by the consumer, who never had a voice in the decision. Moreover, those canceled plants in my district are just a small fraction of the 100 plants that have been canceled around the Nation over the past 10 years.

The routine use of CWIP will take us even further away from the concept of investors carrying the risk. The ratepayer will face not only the possibility of paying for a plant after cancellation, but also the certainty of paying for it even before it generates the first watt. That system substantially replaces the level of risk for the investor, and indeed raises the issue of whether utilities should be allowed such a high rate of return in the future.

Certainly, there is a legitimate role for CWIP, such as in cases where a utility is in very bad financial condition, or where the plant can be justified as essential and the least costly alternative. The bill before us today, H.R. 555, allows for those considerations.

In the final analysis, however, we must recognize that the element of risk that now exists with respect to decisions on power plant construction serves as a healthy brake on building large, costly new plants, which could wind up getting canceled. If a utility cannot convince the investment community to take the risk, then a clear-cut question arises as to why the captive ratepayers should be compelled to take that same risk.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 555 represents a balanced reasonable approach that preserves CWIP for those situations where it is truly justifiable, while protecting electric utility ratepayers from the abuses that could arrive with widespread and unchecked use of CWIP. I urge my colleagues to support the bill.●

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, today I rise in support of H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act of 1983. This bill was drafted in response to a July 1983 ruling of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. In this ruling the Commission overturned a long-term policy which permitted electric utilities to charge customers for the financing costs of new plants under construction on a case-by-case basis. Utilities were allowed to include these costs in their wholesale rate base only if the costs were related to the installation of pollution control facilities or conversion of oil or gas-fired plants to other fuels, or if the utility experienced severe financial difficulty. In its new ruling the Commission now permits any utility, regardless of its financial condition, to automatically include 50 percent of its CWIP costs in its wholesale rate base.

What are the consequences of the new Commission policy?

Consumers will be paying fees for plants not yet providing electricity.

Utilities will no longer be disciplined by the constraints of borrowing money in the financial marketplace.

The financial risk of investment is transferred from the shareholder to the ratepayer.

Public and private power companies which buy electricity from utilities with CWIP will be placed at a competitive disadvantage.

The bottom line is that customers will pay higher rates for electricity.

Since the new rule became effective in July, seven utilities have filed rate increases for CWIP ranging from $457,000 to $50 million. I am sure that these are just the first of many rate hikes. These CWIP increases are piling on top of already rising electric bills to our constituents.

What does H.R. 555 do to help?

It directs the Commission to return to previous policy on CWIP.

It protects the consumer from paying for canceled or deferred construction (in the last 10 years, over 100 powerplants have been canceled after more than $10 billion had been spent on them).

It preserves competition in the electric utility industry.

It will help to insure that generating facilities are cost effective and necessary.

H.R. 555 is needed. I urge my colleagues to join me in voting for it.●

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 555, the Construction Work in Progress Policy Act.

We, as lawmakers, are faced with a responsibility to act on this matter, given the abdication of that responsibility by the appropriate regulatory body, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. In 1983, the Commission abandoned its previously adopted financial distress standard for construction work in progress ratebase inclusion and allowed any utility, regardless of its financial condition or need for such relief, to apply for 50 percent assessment of construction work in progress costs to be included in wholesale ratebases.

This FERC decision abandoned established precedent allowing CWIP charges only in cases of documented financial distress. This policy protects the electric power consumer by insuring that they pay only for a generating ratebase—that is, only for those facilities which are of present benefit to the consumer. Given current estimates of 40 percent excess generating capacity, and given the fact that over 100 powerplants have, in the last decade, been halted after construction started, at a cost of over $10 billion, it is clearly necessary for Congress to act in order to guide not only the decisions of the FERC, but also those State ratemaking authorities which will look to the FERC for prototype regulations in this area.

I am a cosponsor of H.R. 555 and I feel that the bill contains adequate provisions to protect utilities which are able to document financial circumstances leading to an appropriate FERC action for CWIP relief. While we have not restricted the prerogatives of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, we have sought to delimit a standard which will serve as a guidepost for FERC decisions in this area.

Several other aspects of this bill merit attention, most notably those provisons which encourage conversion of oil- and gas-fired plants and installation of pollution control equipment, activities which are sanctioned by this legislation through addition of their cost of ratebases.

H.R. 555 is, in all respects, consumer protection legislation which will have an immediate, favorable impact upon the electric power consumer. I urge my colleagues to vote for its final passage.●

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to the bill?

If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY) having assumed the chair, Mr. DORGAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 555) to amend the Federal Power Act to limit the recovery by public utilities of certain costs of construction work in progress through rate increases, pursuant to House Resolution 375, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

REAGAN'S DEFICIENT FOREIGN POLICY

(Mr. VENTO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, it is a sad day for U.S. foreign policy. President Reagan's murky Lebanon policy has clearly evolved into reaction rather than positive coherent action. Reality emerged with violent events yesterday, and the Reagan Lebanon house of cards came tumbling down.

The President's reaction makes the United States appear weak and without direction. The President has badly misjudged and misrepresented what was possible in Lebanon.

President Reagan had every reason to reassess his policies these past months, but stubbornly refused to do so.

The President's decision to finally redeploy the marines is long overdue and I trust it will occur in fact, not just in rhetoric.

However, President Reagan's orders to initiate brutal ship bombardments and air-strike strategies to cover the embarrassment of his deficient foreign policy are unworthy.

After 264 marines' lives have been sacrificed for this hopeless policy the American people expect some positive answers to fill the vacuum, not a cannonade.

NATIONAL ENERGY EDUCATION DAY

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 146) to designate March 23, 1984, as "National Energy Education Day," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so for the purpose of advising the Chair that the minority has no objection to this resolution being taken up at this time.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I wonder if we could get some idea about what it is costing us to bring this resolution to the floor. Recently I have done a little bit of checking and I find out every time we print one of these resolutions it is costing us something on the order of $1,500. When you add in staff time and all of the things that have to be added in on some of these proclaiming of days, we can easily get the figure up to about $2,500.

I make mention of that because that is what one working family in this country, when they pay their taxes, pays $2,500 in taxes on an average. That means that one family is working the entire year to pay taxes to have us pass one of these resolutions.

I was just wondering whether or not those kinds of cost estimates are anywhere close to being correct.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. This Member from California cannot tell the gentleman what it costs. Perhaps the gentlewoman from Indiana (Mrs. HALL) can relate that to us.

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I yield to the gentlewoman from Indiana.

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very simple question. It is my understanding that any Member of this Congress can get information on what it costs to print any bill or any resolution, and it is quite simple to assign a staff member to do it.

Of course, if Congressman WALKER does not want to do that, I will be happy to ask one of my staff persons to find out and let him know.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I am happy to yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. What I am saying is that I have asked and those are the figures that I have gotten. They are rather disturbing figures. I am just wondering whether or not somebody can confirm that that is, in fact, what it is costing us every time we bring up one of these commemorative resolutions.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have asked a question and I was hoping that maybe somebody could give me an answer.

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. Does the gentleman wish to reveal how much it cost for us to place any kind of extension into the RECORD when we do special orders?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to tell the gentleman that I am not certain of what that cost is. This gentleman is not in the habit of placing remarks into the RECORD, so I do not do that.

Mr. LELAND. I understand that the gentleman, since the gentleman's tenure has been longer here than mine, the gentleman has spent a lot of time extending his remarks into the RECORD, and has spent a lot of money, much more than it costs for a resolution to be extended into the RECORD.

Mr. WALKER. Reclaiming my time, I would say to the gentleman that this gentleman from Pennsylvania has very seldom, if ever, extended his remarks in the RECORD.

I do speak on the floor and I allow the things that I say on the floor to stand in the RECORD. But unlike a lot of Members around here I do not spend my time extending in the RECORD.

So that which is done is done as a part of the permanent RECORD, and so if the gentleman has some information that language is being put in the RECORD in my name as extensions, I would say to the gentleman that I would find that very disturbing because that should not be going on.

Of course, we did have that happen in the committees around here during the last Congress where words that I did not speak were put into a committee record by a staff member. And if the gentleman knows that that is happening here on the floor, I would certainly want that revealed.

Mr. LELAND. There is some information available that suggests that the gentleman has put some extensions of remarks in the RECORD that have been rather extensive, to say the least, and have cost a considerable amount of money.

Now, if that happens not to be the case, this gentleman from Texas apologizes. But I would suggest to the gentleman that those extensions of remarks cost considerably more than a resolution.

□ 1840

Mr. WALKER. Reclaiming my time, the gentleman is making an accusation. Would the gentleman care to tell us exactly what it is that this gentleman has put into the RECORD that cost any money? This gentleman has never gone to the well under the rules of the House and asked for an extension of remarks that cost the taxpayer more than the allocation.

Now if the gentleman knows that it is the case, I would really very much like to know that.

Mr. LELAND. If I may revise my allegation, let me suggest that the gentleman has taken time for special orders as opposed to——

Mr. WALKER. Oh, reserving the right to object, in other words, the gentleman is saying that this gentleman has participated in debate on the floor and has been out here doing my job and has been speaking on the floor and that is going into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and is being printed as a verbatim transcript of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and that that is somehow wrong in this Congress?

Mr. LELAND. No, I did not suggest that.

Mr. WALKER. Is that what the gentleman is saying?

Mr. LELAND. I have never alleged that that was wrong. As a matter of fact, if the gentleman will allow me, all I was suggesting was that the gentleman has spent a considerable amount of money that was paid by the taxpayers to do so. And all I am saying is that under the rules, the gentlewoman from Indiana also has the right to present to this body those resolutions passed through her committee which, by the way, is the responsibility held by this gentlewoman and she also has a right to extend that which is her given responsibility.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has no doubt of that whatsoever. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has no intention of objecting to the resolution being brought to the floor. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was simply trying to ascertain what it is costing the taxpayers to bring a string of these resolutions to the floor. We have had these resolutions coming to the floor on a more and more frequent basis. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is simply suggesting that that is not done without cost and that one of the things that we ought to understand in this body is the fact that at a time when we are talking all the time on this floor about $200 billion deficits, that we in fact contribute to some of that with some of the things we do around here. Now each time we print one of these resolutions it is costing several hundred if not several thousands of dollars. All this gentleman is saying is that I think it might be well to ascertain that cost. And I simply asked a question. I thought it was a reasonable question. How much did this particular bill cost to bring to the floor? And the gentleman from Pennsylvania still has not gotten an answer to that question.

Mr. LELAND. If the gentleman will yield, this gentleman is not trying to badger the gentleman from Pennsylvania nor is he alleging that the gentleman from Pennsylvania expects to object to the resolutions that are on the floor. But I would suggest to you, too, that there are other measures that we ought to look at that also cost money that the gentleman has participated in, and that is the comparison that I make, and that is all.

Mr. WALKER. I understand the gentleman's point. I understand the gentleman is uncomfortable with some of the things that this gentleman is saying in debate on the House floor and that the gentleman——

Mr. LELAND. No, no, no, I am not debating.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman does not want those kinds of things raised as a part of the actual record of the Congress. But this gentleman feels strongly that if you want to do your job——

Mr. LELAND. I beg the gentleman's pardon; that is not the suggestion that I am putting forward.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I have the time and then I will yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES). Is there objection?

Mr. WALKER. I am reserving the right to object, which is the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman may proceed under his reservation.

Mr. WALKER. Reserving the right to object, I would simply say that I think that it is rather questionable to suggest that we shut down debate in the House of Representatives in order to save the American people money. That is what the gentleman from Texas is suggesting here, and I think that would be a tragedy, that we would gag the Members of Congress in order to save the American taxpayers a little bit of money.

All I am simply doing in reserving the right to object is to ask whether or not we have some idea as to what this bill is costing. If I get that answer I will be very glad to withdraw the reservation.

Mr. LELAND. May I ask the gentleman one more question?

Mr. WALKER. I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LELAND. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania go to the committee of jurisdiction that handles these resolutions and ask the same questions?

Mr. WALKER. I would be very glad to do that. I just thought that at the time that it came up on the floor that that might be a very appropriate time to ask the question because each bill that comes up before that committee, of course, is not going to come to the floor. The committee does exercise some——

Mr. LELAND. Some frugality.

Mr. WALKER. They certainly sort out among them.

Mr. LELAND. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. And I think it is important to recognize that they have to have 218 signatures before they bring it to the floor. I think that is a very reasonable kind of rule. I am just wondering how much it is costing each time we are doing it. It seems to me a legitimate kind of question, one that should not have caused this much furor. If we do not have an answer now perhaps next time we bring a bill to the floor maybe we will know how much money it is costing and that would satisfy this gentleman. But it is a question, I think, that is worth thinking about.

● Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, few proclamations generate as much activity and public participation as the National Energy Education Day (NEED). NEED is a 10-year effort aimed at promoting ongoing energy education programs in our Nation's schools. Its projects inform students and the general public about energy and its effect on employment, research and development, Government policies, global events, and future career opportunities.

This year's theme for National Energy Education Day is "Energy Works for America." From a scientific viewpoint, it will explore how the laws of physics and chemistry relate to our production and use of energy for transportation, communication, manufacturing, and in personal lives.

Our continued support can give these young Americans a headstart by encouraging educators, public officials, industry, and community leaders to help our youth focus on energy issues throughout their schooling in an organized and challenging manner. That is the objective of National Energy Education Day.●

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 146

Whereas an adequate and competitively priced energy supply is essential for a strong economy in the United States;

Whereas affordable energy resources are required to fuel the economic growth which will provide new jobs and employment opportunities so that all people of our society may enjoy a higher standard of living and greater prosperity;

Whereas the developments needed for the future will require greater attention to the scientific laws in the areas of physics and chemistry as they relate to the development, distribution, and efficient use of our energy for transportation, communication, manufacturing, and personal use;

Whereas people are striving to make energy work more efficiently in their homes, transportation systems, and workplaces;

Whereas fundamental changes in the United States energy future requires the United States educational system at all grade levels to prepare our youth for the new demands and challenges which lie ahead;

Whereas the celebration of a National Energy Education Day (NEED) will bring together students, teachers, school officials, and community members to focus attention on the need for a greater understanding of energy issues; and

Whereas such celebration should be conducted in a manner which encourages a deeper understanding of the efficient ways energy works for the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in order to promote and enhance energy education programs at all grade levels of public and private schools throughout the United States, March 23, 1984, is designated "National Energy Education Day". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people and educational institutions of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities, and directing all Federal agencies to participate in the observance of such day and to cooperate with persons and institutions conducting such ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL INVENTORS' DAY

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 271) designating February 11, 1984, as "National Inventors' Day," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I make this reservation for the sole purpose of indicating the minority has no objection to the House taking up this resolution.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from California yield under his reservation?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, today I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 271 declaring February 11, 1984, as National Inventor's Day. This date is the birthday of one of America's greatest inventors, Thomas Edison.

As in years past, I am chief sponsor of the resolution due to my chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee's subcommittee with jurisdiction over patent law. I would like to thank the 232 Members of the House who have joined with me in honoring those individuals who have dedicated themselves to bettering society through the inventive process. I also would like to thank my counterpart chair, the gentlelady from Indiana (Mrs. HALL) and Mr. DANNEMEYER for bringing this joint resolution to the floor.

House Joint Resolution 271 sets aside a time to honor those people who have sparked the great technological advancement of our Nation. We entrust our future to the inexhaustibly creative minds of our people. By recognizing their contributions, we focus attention on the importance of innovation in meeting the challenges of a highly technological world.

The National Council of Patent Law Associations in conjunction with the Patent and Trademark Office sponsors the National Inventor's Hall of Fame into which four new members will be inducted this year. This year's inductees include: William M. Burton, who is responsible for the manufacturing of gasoline; Wallace H. Carothers, the inventor of nylon; Phillo T. Farnsworth, producer of the first all electronic television system; and Theodore H. Maiman, designer of the ruby laser system.

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to concur in the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER) and note that our Founding Fathers recognized the importance of inventors when they adopted without dissent, at the Constitutional Convention, the vital provision in article I, section 8, that Congress shall have the power:

> To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

Perhaps, Daniel Webster in a speech in Congress, in 1824, said it best when he declared that:

> Invention is the fruit of a man's brain, that industries grow in proportion to invention and that therefore the Government must aid progress by fostering the inventive genius of its citizens.

I think it is important that we recognize all those people who have made contributions to the welfare of this country through the development of new products and processes.

Accordingly, I urge the adoption of House Joint Resolution 271.●

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 271

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in honor of the important role played by inventors in promoting progress in the useful arts and in recognition of the invaluable contribution of inventors to the welfare of our people, February 11, 1984, is hereby designated "National Inventors' Day". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to celebrate such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OLDER AMERICANS MONTH

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 466) designating May 1984 as "Older Americans Month," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do so only for the purpose of indicating that the minority has no objection to this resolution being taken up by the House at this time.

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 466, which expresses the sense of Congress that our Nation should observe the month of May 1984 as Older Americans Month. Since 1963, the President has proclaimed each May as the month to express the Nation's gratitude to its senior citizens. In years past, Congress joined in this tribute to our senior citizens when it passed previous Older Americans Month resolutions. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to recognize our senior citizens again this year.

I have always been a strong believer in assisting our older Americans. Our country relies in large part on the wisdom and experience of previous generations. Senior citizens have enriched our society immeasurably, always providing us with a keen perspective on life. It is important for parents to instill a sense of respect and admiration in our youth toward those who have come before them. Their energy, experience, drive, and zest for life cause this Nation to turn to them for knowledge, solace, and guidance.

Senior citizens across the country have continued to contribute their caring and goodwill for their fellow neighbors through programs such as the Foster Grandparents program. The Westchester, Orange, Rockland and Sullivan Counties programs in my 22d Congressional District, has provided love and attention to underprivileged and handicapped children for many years. These senior citizens volunteers range in age from 60 to 89 and work 4 hours per day, 5 days a week. There are over 16,000 foster grandparents in 199 projects throughout the United States, and I am certain that my colleagues feel as certain as I do about the positive contributions made by these volunteers.

It is only fitting that the love and caring that our elderly give to all of us be recognized by the country as a whole. House Joint Resolution 466 sets aside the entire month of May for us to pay tribute to the selflessness of all older Americans. I join my colleagues in thanking these dedicated men and women for their ongoing service and contributions to communities all across America, and I urge support of House Joint Resolution 466.●

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 466

Whereas older Americans have contributed many years of service to their families, their communities, and the Nation;

Whereas the population of the United States is comprised of a large percentage of older Americans representing a wealth of knowledge and experience;

Whereas older Americans should be acknowledged for the contributions they continue to make to their communities and the Nation; and

Whereas many States and communities acknowledge older Americans during the month of May: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in recognition of the traditional designation of the month of May as "Older Americans Month" and the repeated expression by the Congress of its appreciation and respect for the achievements of older Americans and its desire that these Americans continue to play an active role in the life of the Nation, the President is directed to issue a proclamation designating the month of May 1984 as "Older Americans Month" and calling on the people of the United States to observe this month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the several joint resolutions just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. BILIRAKIS) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. WALKER, for 60 minutes, on February 9.

Mr. GINGRICH, for 60 minutes, on February 9.

Mr. WEBER, for 60 minutes, on February 9.

Mr. MACK, for 60 minutes, on February 9.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that today, following legislative business and any special orders heretofore entered into, the following Members may be permitted to address the House, revise and extend their remarks, and include therein extraneous material:

Ms. OAKAR, for 45 minutes, today.

Mr. ANNUNZIO, for 5 minutes, today.

Mrs. COLLINS, for 15 minutes, today.

Mr. GONZALEZ, for 30 minutes, today.

Mr. MARTINEZ, for 10 minutes, on February 9.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WALKER. Reserving the right to object, I assume that none of those Members is going to use those and cost the taxpayers money, are they?

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. The gentleman might be able to answer that himself. I am only doing what has been asked of me to do at this moment. I am not prepared to answer that.

Does the gentleman have the answer to that?

Mr. WALKER. Well, I do not have an answer to it, but since the gentleman was making the requests——

Mr. LELAND. Well, why does not the gentleman just speculate.

Mr. WALKER. Reserving the right to object, I just thought that since the gentleman was critical a few minutes ago——

Mr. LELAND. No, no, no, the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. WALKER [continuing]. Of utilizing special order time and saying that that might cost the taxpayers money. I just thought that since he was making the request, we would want to make certain that none of those Members was actually going to cost the taxpayers any money.

Mr. LELAND. Let me ask the gentleman, was I critical of the gentleman?

Mr. WALKER. I would not say the gentleman was critical, the gentleman was just raising a question as to whether or not debate on the floor cost the taxpayers money. And I had to admit to the gentleman that in fact it did, but I thought that it was money probably well spent.

Mr. LELAND. Very good.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AN AGENDA FOR THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. Is this going to cost the taxpayers any money for the gentleman to do this?

Mr. WALKER. Well, I am going to participate in debate here on the House floor under the rules of the House and I would hope that that is within the business of the House.

Back a couple of years ago we had a gentleman that was suggesting that casting votes in the House of Representatives was costing us money. And he went through and he added up all the costs of casting votes in the House of Representatives.

And I suggested to people at that time that one of the things that we ought to be all about in the House of Representatives was casting votes, that one of the problems in this body is that we do not cast enough votes, that we are not accountable enough to our constituents.

But this gentleman thought that that was just terrible, that Members of Congress would actually have to come over and cast votes after being elected here.

It seems to me another thing that we are elected to do around here is come to this floor and explain to the American people and explain to our constituents that it is something that we ought to come to the floor and say for the record those things which we believe, rather than simply going out and wandering around the countryside telling the American people things that we think that they want to hear, but are unwilling to put on the record in this Congess.

I think I am disturbed when I see what is happening as a pattern in this Congress where many, many Members of Congress are not willing to really come out here and go on the record and really willing to debate, but rather have reduced their participation in this Congress to handing in prepared sheets of paper that go into Extensions of Remarks or go into the RECORD as supposedly words said on the House floor which were never spoken.

I am tired of a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in all honesty I would tell the gentleman, that is a travesty of the truth. I am perfectly willing to bring my views to the floor and debate them. And I think that is one of the things that we should be all about as a legislative body. That is one of the jobs that we are sent here to do.

And so if the gentleman is asking whether it costs the taxpayers something for me to do my job, yes, the taxpayers do have to pay for me to do my job. And they have to do some of the things that are ancillary to my doing my job, but I think that that is after all what the Constitution says that this representative role is all about.

Mr. LELAND. I would just like to thank the gentleman for his eloquent instruction.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, one of the things that I thought we ought to do this evening is talk a little bit about a couple of things that happened in the course of today.

We are more and more concerned about the kind of arrogance and abuse that is going on, on the floor with regard to an agenda that the American people want to see discussed here.

There is a real concern when you see an opportunity opened up for the American people to have legislation that has been reported out of committee brought to this floor and once again today, for the second week in a row, every chairman of every committee of this House told the American people that they do not have legislation important enough to bring to this House under Calendar Wednesday.

I think that that has to be disturbing. It has to show that there is a closed shop around here, that there is a kind of arrogance that says that we will hold everything and only bring it out under stranglehold rules under ways in which we can limit debate and ways in which we have the ability to control the process, rather than bringing it out under processes which are more open and more democratic.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Well, is it not conceivable though that there was not any legislation to bring forward, that there was not a bill that had been reported out of committee that could have been brought to the floor?

Mr. WALKER. Well, the gentleman is right that that is a possibility. However, it is just not the truth as it relates to today. There are a number of bills that were on the Union Calendar, bills that had been reported out of almost all the committees of this House, that could have brought to the floor for consideration.

I would mention one. There is the tax reform bill. We have heard the Democrats talking an awful lot in recent weeks about additional taxes, about the need for more taxes for balancing the budget and getting rid of deficits. They could have brought a bill to the floor today that would have allowed them to offer their tax package. It would have allowed them, through amendment, to offer a tax package out here and tell the American people specifically how they wanted to tax them to get the budget deficits down. They refused to bring that bill out here.

I would also point out that that bill was also available then to be amended for some of us who believe that what we need in this country is tax reform to get rid of some of the power of the special interest, to get rid of some of the greedy special interests that have gotten their hooks into the tax system and are forcing the American working people to pay more and more taxes while they reap the benefits out of the system.

Some of us think that ought to be reformed. And we would love to get a bill out here under an open rule where we could amend some of those provisions of the Tax Code to get away from some of that greedy special interest power.

But, of course, that was not brought to the floor even though it was available to be brought to the floor this afternoon.

Mr. MACK. Well, maybe the gentleman might go a step further and explain why Calendar Wednesday. What is the reason for having this particular technique and why could not the chairmen have asked the Speaker to have a specific piece of legislation brought to the floor? Why use Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. WALKER. Well, what Calendar Wednesday does is it avoids having to get a rule on a bill. It means that when you bring the bill out here it is subject to 2 hours of general debate. And then it is an open rule, which means that you can add any germane amendments that would be applicable. That would mean that for the first time in as long as I can remember in the Congress, we would actually have a tax bill out here under an open rule. Instead of the way that we usually get tax bills here on the floor under a closed rule that says that only a handful of Members are going to be able to offer amendments and those amendments will be very, very specific in nature, which means that you cannot get a broad based reform of the tax system under the kinds of rules that they bring to the floor.

They foreclose the possibility of bringing matters to the floor under a more, as I say, open and democratic kind of process as would be available under Calendar Wednesday.

□ 1900

What we had was virtually every committee chairman saying, "No, I do not want to participate in that kind of open process; I want to stick with the kind of process around here that freezes us into a closed dictatorial system rather than an open democratic one."

Mr. MACK. Well, it sounds like maybe the committee chairmen were not prepared.

Is Calendar Wednesday something which occurs each week, and has been for many years?

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. Calendar Wednesday has been a part of the rules of the House since at least early in this century, and I think it goes back into the 19th century. So this is not a day which catches the chairman unawares. It is certainly part of the rules.

And, of course, it was first objected to when they tried to waive it last week, so that the chairman knew well that this was going to come up and that they could have been prepared.

Mr. MACK. Let me interrupt again, if I may.

Why would they object to Calendar Wednesday? Why would they try to waive Calendar Wednesday? I do not understand that.

Mr. WALKER. Well, of course, for years around here we waived every Calendar Wednesday because, once again, the people who lead this Congress, the leadership of this Congress, are saying they want total control of every piece of legislation. They want it to go through the Rules Committee, they want to bring it to the floor under a rule, or they want to bring it out here under the Suspension Calendar where you have absolutely no opportunity to amend.

Mr. MACK. Or maybe they do not want to bring it out at all?

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman makes an excellent point. In many instances what they do not want to do is have some of that legislation come out here at all. And we have literally dozens of bills of very, very great importance to the American people that are being held in committee and are not permitted to come to this floor for debate or for action.

We are trying, as best we know how, through various techniques, to try to open up the process to allow more of the bills to come to this floor, to allow the American people's agenda to be voted upon; but, of course, we are being thwarted by people who have no desire whatsoever to see votes occur on those issues or to see those issues even debated on this floor.

Mr. MACK. So it sounds like what you are saying is that because there are certain pieces of legislation that at least in our opinion are of a great deal of interest to the American people, whether that is the line-item veto that we have been talking about for the last several weeks, or the balanced budget amendment, or school prayer, we just cannot seem to get that legislation to the floor because somewhere along the system somebody blocks it; that, in essence, what we have been doing is resurrecting the idea of Calendar Wednesday with the hope that we can force some of that legislation to come to the floor. Is that what the gentleman is saying?

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. That is precisely what we are attempting to do. Calendar Wednesday is not a perfect vehicle. As a matter of fact, it is a pretty lousy vehicle to achieve some of the things that we are trying to achieve. But it is one way of having a little more open process than this House has had for the last 25 years; and it has been with a great deal of frustration that we have attempted to do this.

We have been put upon by many of the forces of abuse around here who say what we are doing is obstructionist, and so on, when really what we are doing is opening up a process that has been closed and kept away from the American people for far too long.

Mr. MACK. What the gentleman is saying, then, is that he is trying to use every possible avenue to allow legislation to come to the floor.

Mr. WALKER. That is exactly correct.

Mr. MACK. And we are going a step further. At the beginning of this session, frankly, we were kind of saying that it was the Speaker who was blocking legislation. For example, at the end of the last session, we were claiming that the Speaker was using what I had called an arrogant abuse of power in not allowing the immigration reform bill to come to the floor of the House. But really what we are saying now is, now that we have reactivated, so to speak, Calendar Wednesday, each of the committee chairmen is also a part of blocking this kind of legislation.

Mr. WALKER. I think what we see is an entire leadership problem. We see the entire leadership of the Democratic Party lined up in a way that would prevent legislation from coming to the Hill. Yes. You cannot singly target one individual any longer.

It has now become apparent to the American people that it is the majority leadership in this body that is the problem. I think that that becomes clear every time we see Calendar Wednesday passed over with no chairmen at all coming to the floor saying that they have legislation to bring before us.

Mr. MACK. Again, I guess we have to place the emphasis on Calendar Wednesday because as we started out this session we were asking unanimous consent to bring certain pieces of legislation to the floor, and there was a ruling by the Chair that in order for us to use that particular technique we would actually have to get approval not only from the minority leadership but also from the majority leadership; is that correct?

Mr. WALKER. Well, sure. That was the way of making certain that, once again, that accountability would not be a factor here on the floor. By asking unanimous consent to bring legislation to the House, we were forcing certain Members of the majority to stand up and object to that; and they found it very uncomfortable to stand up and object to bringing balanced budget legislation to the floor or bringing school prayer legislation to the floor or bringing line-item veto legislation to the floor.

It became very uncomfortable to object to that, and so they went to the Speaker and they said, "Save us, save us, do not make us go through this exercise. You come down with a ruling, you give us a ruling that says that the Chair will simply not recognize any requests of that type."

And that is exactly the ruling they got. So Members were muzzled, Members were gagged here on the floor from being able to raise legitimate issues, raise legitimate motions, and we were in effect told that, "Your legislative agenda will never be permitted to come to the floor under what had previously been a legitimate means for getting legislation considered."

I would remind the gentleman that that unanimous-consent technique was used just a few years ago when the Members wanted to raise the outside limits on earnings that we could take. Boy, when we wanted to do that, and when we wanted to boost those up a little bit and get a little bit bigger share of the pie for ourselves, it was no problem then, boy. They came running out here in about 20 seconds with one of those unanimous-consent requests, and the Chair gaveled it through, and the American people never were the wiser; there was no debate on it; it just happened lickety-split, just like that.

But when you come to some issue like voluntary school prayer, then we have a ruling from the Chair that says, "Well, you cannot do it, fellows. That is the wrong kind of thing to have done. Only when we want to line our own pockets do we allow techniques of that type to be used."

Mr. MACK. So what the gentleman is saying is that, in the past, the unanimous-consent request was made to, in essence, increase a Member's pay, which apparently everybody agreed to, and then when we tried to use that to bring meaningful legislation to the floor of the House, the Chair ruled that it was no longer in order.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. That is exactly what happened.

What I am saying is that we were not using some kind of extraordinary technique when we were asking unanimous consent for this to be done. It was something that was done when we wanted to raise the outside earnings. We basically doubled the outside earnings that Members of Congress were allowed to take, using that kind of technique. And it was perfectly fine then, but it is not perfectly fine when you want to raise the issue of voluntary school prayer.

Mr. MACK. Let me raise this question: The gentleman mentioned a minute ago that Members on the other side of the aisle apparently went to the Speaker and said, "We have got to stop this, it is becoming embarrassing," I guess, for some Members to have to stand up.

Mr. WALKER. That is what this gentleman has to assume, yes.

Mr. MACK. Why would they be embarrassed? There are certainly people over there who support a balanced budget amendment. That is an item I think that cuts across the line. I mean I think there are Members on both sides of the aisle who feel very strongly—at least, from what I hear people saying, they are very interested in balancing the budget.

Mr. WALKER. As the gentleman knows, it is a question of accountability. They all want to say they are for a balanced budget; they want to go back to their districts and they want to tell the people how they are for balanced budgets and how this horrible President is increasing all the deficits, and so on, and they just have no control whatever. They kind of forget their oath that they swear allegiance to the Constitution; they kind of do not look at the Constitution that says that we have control over spending in this body.

I mean those things are conveniently forgotten. But they want to go home and talk like budget balancers and people against the deficit, and then when someone raises an issue where they might have to actually vote on it, they want to object to it or find a way to objecting to it without being held accountable for that objection. And that is exactly what they have achieved now. The Chair simply does not recognize the motion; so, therefore, they are not personally held accountable.

It seems to me that what the American people should demand most from this body is accountability; that what they should demand most from us is that we vote on issues so that they can tell how we voted, and that we speak to issues so that they can understand what it is we are saying.

What we see more and more and more of in this body is an attempt, first of all to dissuade us from voting on issues, either by keeping the issues locked up in committee so there are no votes or, once they come to the floor, to try to frame it in a way that there are no votes, or we also have techniques to keep people from speaking to the issues. And we have just gone through an exercise here a few minutes ago where it was suggested that we ought to consider some of these things that might end up gagging Members even more.

□ 1910

The Members of this body, particularly the Members of the minority, already this session have been gagged time and time again. This is becoming a constant pattern of the majority since the opening days of this session about 3 weeks ago, of attempting to gag the minority and actually, in some instances, gagging the minority.

I think it is an abuse of power. It is an arrogance of power that is becoming very, very evident to anybody who wants to take a look at the record in a fair way.

Mr. MACK. If the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman began to touch on another subject which you talked about a little bit earlier, and that is in essence verbatim transcripts of the proceedings on the floor. This is something that I think the gentleman talked about last week.

Would the gentleman expand on that a little bit?

Mr. WALKER. Well, one of the things that this gentleman is concerned about is the fact that when people pick up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, many people out across the country assume what they are getting in that CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a verbatim transcript that tells actually what went on here on the House floor.

Instead, when they pick it up, it is nothing of the kind. It has a lot of speeches in it that were never made. Some of the speeches that were made are so drastically revised that they say something completely different from what was actually said; that we have a collection of distortions, in some cases outright lies, that are passing as the record of this Congress. That is, I think, a real question about the way in which this body operates.

It is my point that what we ought to do is, we ought to have a record which says what went on. If the gentleman and I talk here on the floor as we are talking right now, the RECORD the next day ought to reflect our conversation. You ought not be able to go back and change every remark you made to say something completely different from the statement you just made. I ought not be able to do that either. We ought to both be here on the floor discussing the issues, and only that discussion should appear in the RECORD as being the actual record of the House.

Now, if somebody wants to revise and extend their remarks, fine; let us put that in the back of the RECORD somewhere, like we have "Extensions of Remarks" now, and if somebody wants to make a long, windy speech about some issue, let us at least point out to the American people that that long, windy speech was prepared in the guy's office by some staff member who labors over a typewriter doing that kind of thing, but the fellow did not actually come to the floor and deliver that speech. We ought to make it clear to the American people just what is what here and which is which.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Does it make it any better if the long, windy speech is given extemporaneously?

Mr. WALKER. I think it does, I would say to the gentleman, because at least you are on the record that way; at least we are on the floor debating and the gentleman from Ohio can rise and raise questions and do as he pleases. It makes it a good deal different, because there is accountability to that.

What we have in too many of the cases on this floor is the fact that we have no accountability. We have legislative history being written by staff aides of committees that is then stuck into the RECORD and passes for being something which actually took place on this floor and is judged by the courts of the land as being a legislative history.

Mr. SEIBERLING. That is against the rules of the House.

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman that it happens around here all the time. It may be against the rules of the House, but there are very long transcripts put into the RECORD right after a Member stands up and says, "Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and rise in favor of the bill," and then a long speech follows that was never delivered on this House floor that becomes a part of the legislative history.

If the gentleman from Ohio does not believe that is happening, he must be walking around with his eyes closed on this floor. It happens all the time out here.

Mr. SEIBERLING. All I can say is that if there is a debate on the floor with respect to a point that is crucial, and I am not talking about just a Member saying, "I support the bill," and giving all his reasons, then under the rules of the House, any Member who puts in additional material that is germane and is of substance and is not merely additional personal remarks is violating the rules both in spirit and letter and should be called to account.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman has to be concerned about what goes on around here, then, because back, I think it was in the last Congress, when we passed a bill around here on black lung disease, included down in that bill was a tax break for Members of Congress.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, that was in the bill, not just in the remarks on the floor.

Mr. WALKER. It was in the bill, and what the claim was later on was that if you voted for that you had to know that the information with regard to the tax break for Members was down in there because it was said on the floor. Just look at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and sure enough, if you went to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there was a speech in there by the chairman of the committee that indicated that, in fact, that was in there.

However, when one of the Members from the gentleman's side of the aisle went back and reviewed the video tapes, he found that those words were never spoken; that they were added later on. That is a pretty substantive point to have left out of the debate that was later added in. I am saying to the gentleman that that is the kind of question that the American people have every right to get upset about.

Mr. SEIBERLING. If the gentleman will yield further, all I have to say is, I happen to have been present when that bill was passed by voice vote.

Mr. WALKER. No, it was a recorded vote on it, I would say to the gentleman. I was present, too, and there were about 47 of us who voted against it.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Well, all right, I guess it was a recorded vote. But in any event, there had to be a tacit conspiracy on both sides of the aisle to not bring out the fact that this bill covered that particular point or it never could have happened.

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman, I do not know about these tacit conspiracies. As for this gentleman, I voted "no" on the bill because I knew it was in there.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Most of the Members did not.

Mr. WALKER. That is right; most gentlemen did not because it was not explained to them. But the point is that later on in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD it appeared as though it was explained to the Members of the House. That language was added later on.

I am saying to the gentleman that that is not an accurate CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and that is a substantive point of the type that the gentleman said was against the rules. I do not know how it happened, then.

Mr. SEIBERLING. If the gentleman will yield further, I simply say that on that point, I do not think that added any substance to it, because the fact is it was in the bill and whatever else was said was really immaterial because that did not add anything except an appearance; it did not add substantively to the legislative history.

Mr. WALKER. I respect the gentleman's viewpoint, of course, but good heavens, if you later on refer back to that and say, "Of course the Members knew about it because it was said on the floor," it seems to me you are then saying that that was the legislative history that was developed on the floor. That is the point. Some people got very badly burned by that. I, for one, find that disturbing.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I agree with the gentleman. I think that was excessive and really was a violation of the spirit if not the letter of the rule.

Mr. WALKER. And this gentleman from Pennsylvania simply cites that as one example. There are numerous other examples of the same kind of thing happening, and I think it is most disturbing.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, I just want to engage the gentleman from Ohio for just a moment, because this is now the first several days of the second year that I have been in Congress, and I guess it really was a shock to me the first time I really understood what the gentleman from Pennsylvania is talking about: That you can read through the RECORD, being somewhat naive, I guess, expecting that everything that was recorded in that RECORD, actually took place here on the floor of the House.

I think the point that is being raised here, and I think very well in that particular discussion about that vote, is an excellent point. I think we ought to get back to the point where what we say and what we do on the floor of the House is accurately recorded in the RECORD.

Mr. SEIBERLING. There is a very simple way of accomplishing that, and that is whenever someone asks for permission to extend his remarks you just get up and object. However, a lot of your colleagues on that side of the aisle will not be very happy if you do.

Mr. MACK. I think the point that the gentleman makes is a good one. My reaction back to the gentleman is going to be that if, in fact, we did get up and do that, I have a feeling that the relationship between Members would deteriorate quite rapidly.

Mr. WALKER. There is another way of doing it, too, I would say to the gentleman, and that is to have verbatim transcripts of the Congress, to have the same kind of transcripts that virtually every other parliamentary democracy has. They have verbatim transcripts of their proceedings. Virtually all the courts of this land depend upon verbatim transcripts, and in many of those courts life and death decisions are being made, and verbatim transcripts are good enough for them.

Only in the Congress do we abrogate to ourselves a license to be something better than what our words would really indicate that we are.

□ 1920

Only in the Congress do we say that we should have the ability to clean things up a little bit so that we look better than the words we may have actually spoken. That to me is wrong, and that is what we have got to get away from.

I wanted to raise one other point here, too, and that is that having gone through Calendar Wednesday with none of these things being raised on the floor today and none of the issues being brought out that could have been brought out on a Calendar Wednesday, we had another interesting vote then this afternoon as well. We had a vote on whether or not to adjourn this House.

Now, the adjournment resolution is for a period of time that had been set aside for some period of time to go home for a Lincoln-Washington Day recess, understandably. But some of us are under the impression that that might also be time to act on some of the agenda the American people think is important, and that had we decided not to go home, we might have stayed here for a week and taken up some of these issues, principally economic issues and balanced budget issues that are very much on the minds of the American people. Instead, we had a vote, and we find out who wants to wing off to places unknown—some home, some to other parts of the world—and who wants to stay here and work. And the vote was rather interesting. Two to one, the Republicans voted to stay here and do the country's work; 9 to 1, the Democrats voted to wing off to heaven knows where.

Now, it seems to me that the American people may want to assess that vote a little bit when they ask themselves, "Why aren't the issues being voted on?" Because later on in this session I will tell anyone that what is going to happen is we are going to be told that we do not have time to act on these issues, we do not have time to come to the floor and act on the issues. We had time, and the Democrats voted to leave town instead.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, that really should not surprise the gentleman. What occurred was that there was Calendar Wednesday, which is a device to try to get legislation to the floor that is being blocked for one reason or another, and I think the gentleman said earlier that every committee chairman opted not to bring any legislation to the floor. Is that correct?

Mr. WALKER. Every committee chairman decided they did not have anything valuable enough to bring to the floor, that is right.

Mr. MACK. It seems to me that if they are going to say that there is not anything—I think that was done last week also; is that correct?

Mr. WALKER. Absolutely. Every chairman last week said he did not have anything valuable enough to bring to the floor.

Mr. MACK. And it is not surprising to me, and I guess the gentleman is not really surprised either, that 9 to 1 they decided to adjourn.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely right. I mean I am not really surprised at all, because the fact is that we could come back here next week and they would have nothing to do next week either. So the vote to leave town and leave all the business behind is a typical vote and is a perfectly understandable vote, given the character of what we have done thus far in this Congress. So I have to say to the gentleman, yes, the vote was completely in character, but nevertheless somewhat disturbing to people across this country who wonder why Congress is not getting the things done that they believe ought to be done.

Here we are, we have got 3 weeks that we have been back in town since we went home for 3 months, and now we are taking another 1½ weeks or 1 week off to go out to the countryside again.

I would like to think that one of the reasons why we would go out is to listen to the American people and what they are having to say about the issues of the day, but the fact is they are going to be saying the same things now that they were saying 3 weeks ago, and then we are going to come back to town and we are going to do nothing about balancing the budget, controlling spending, implementing school prayer, getting rid of crime—all the things that we hear about in our districts. We are not going to do anything about them when we get back here. We are going to once again say, "I have been home and I have been listening to the American people, but I can't do anything about it because the committee chairmen are holding up all of these things the committee chairmen are holding as hostage."

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just wanted to rise to make the point that when we voted today to take this recess, anyone who voted yes on that resolution has forfeited the right later to stand up and tell us we do not have time to take up prayer in the school, we do not have time to take up a balanced budget, and we do not have time to take up line-item veto.

Our point was not that we should necessarily not have a district work period or that the House should not be scheduled in an orderly manner. Our point was to make the case that there is plenty of time for this House to make major decisions if it wants to do that. There is more than ample opportunity for this House to act if it wants to.

I rise tonight, and I particularly listened to what I thought was a remarkably instructive dialog between the gentleman from Ohio, the gentleman from Florida, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania about behavior in the House. I am not sure whether there have been in the past conspiracies on a bipartisan basis between leaderships, but I do think it is clear—and it is something which I suspect the gentleman from Texas has often noted from the particular concerns that he has eloquently represented on this House floor—that one of the saddest things about serving up here is the degree to which double talk and deceit becomes the norm. And it becomes the norm all too often in the executive branch, it becomes the norm all too often with the lobbyists, and it becomes the norm all too often on this floor, as the gentleman pointed out, to have someone get up and say, "You should have known something was in the bill because I said so on the floor," and then to go back and view the video tapes and find out in fact that it was never said on the floor. It is not just a little game.

As we begin to close out our first 3 weeks here and prepare for this recess, I just want to restate a point that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I think, has been carrying for 3 or 4 weeks now. There is a group on our side of the aisle that actually believes in the House of Representatives. We think it is actually possible for this body to meet on the floor systematically and to decide things systematically. We think that in fact the committees and the power which has drifted off into the committees are, if anything, now an obstruction to the great decisions that have to be made in this country. When I look at the events of the day, the crisis in Lebanon, with the pain and the misery over there, the drop in the stock market, the blackmail by the Chairman of the Federal Reserve, the threat to jobs in America, and I look at all the serious problems we face as a country, I think a great deal of the petty antics that go on in this House is ridiculous and an insult to the American people.

In closing, I want to say for the record and to the Democratic leadership that runs this House that we have no interest in coming back here and playing games, we have no interest in coming back here with unanimous-consent requests, we have no desire to come back here for Calendar Wednesday, and there is a simple, easy way to avoid that. If the leadership that dominates this House, that sets the Calendar, that controls the committees—if that leadership will simply agree to a schedule through the spring to allow us to bring up the package that the President has now gotten through the Senate which will stop crime and stop drugs and give Americans a chance to live in a safe, decent neighborhood, and to bring up legislation to provide for prayer in the schools, to bring up a line-item veto—we are not asking that they pass it; we can understand it if the liberal Democratic leadership opposes all these things—but I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania was exactly right in saying that the first thing the people of the United States should expect from us for our salary, having sworn an oath to uphold the Constitution, is that we will stand here and be counted on our votes, not just on our ability to speak.

So if the Democratic leadership that runs this House would simply agree to schedule in advance a guaranteed series of votes on the key issues that face America and would agree to a bipartisan effort to arrange a calendar that is legitimate and that both sides have advanced notice of, then I think we will get through a productive spring. But I think if in fact they are determined to play the part of petty dictators, they are determined to hold off the floor bills that the American people want, and they are determined to strangle any opportunity for an organized and orderly process, then I think we must come back here determined to make sure that the American people know who in fact is killing the things they want.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his statement.

There would be an easy solution even around that if they would just allow the minority each week to have two bills on the calendar, allow the minority leadership, for instance, to select a couple of bills to go on the calendar for each week. That would assure that we would get the kind of debate that we want, because we know which bills the minority would begin to call onto the House floor. That is all that we really need. We could go through an orderly process, as the gentleman said, we could have debate on these major issues, and it would be done within the rules and the decorum of the House.

That would certainly be a way of assuring the American people that we are accountable for our actions here and for our votes on the issues of concern to them.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I thank him for again using the time constructively tonight to try to tell the American people what is going on in the House of Representatives.

I would like to just develop again a little bit the issue our colleague, the gentleman from Georgia, raised in passing, because the pattern of this House blocking consideration of major legislation is not beginning to subside; it is getting worse.

We had a good example of it just last week with the vote in the Senate on Federal Criminal Code revision, major anticrime legislation, which passed the U.S. Senate by a vote of 91 to 1. It was pretty bipartisan.

Mr. WALKER. Would the gentleman repeat that again? What was the vote in the Senate?

Mr. WEBER. The vote in the Senate was 91 to 1 in favor of Criminal Code revision, legislation to toughen our anticrime laws in this country.

Mr. WALKER. So it is pretty popular over there?

Mr. WEBER. It is pretty popular. It is bipartisan.

□ 1930

When it came to this House, the liberal leadership of this House said they were not even going to consider it on the floor of the House of Representatives. They pronounced it in the words of one Democratic Member "dead on arrival."

Mr. WALKER. Is that in the rules, is there anything in the rules of the House that declares a bill dead on arrival?

Mr. WEBER. Well, I have checked with the rules. I do not find dead on arrival.

Mr. WALKER. DOA is not in our rules, then?

Mr. WEBER. If we could find DOA in the rules, it would apply to a whole lot of things, like immigration reform, bankruptcy reform, school prayer, and in this case, of course, Federal Criminal Code revision.

I want to read into the RECORD some statements from a source that usually is pretty sympathetic to the liberal majority, that is the Washington Post, in an editorial that they ran on Monday of this week, entitled "DOA in the House?"

I quote from the Washington Post editorial:

The Senate has a history of giving serious consideration to criminal code revision. Why shouldn't it? The subject is of paramount interest to voters, the proposals are the product of long years of expert deliberation and wide-ranging hearings, and the legislative documents themselves offer tens of thousands of pages of information and recommendations. The country has invested both resources and talent in this efort, and it is certainly worthy of consideration by Congress. Why, then, when the bill passed the Senate once again last week, did some House wag pronounce it "dead on arrival" in that chamber?

Mr. WALKER. It seems that House wag was the Democratic leader of this body, was it not?

Mr. WEBER. I point out again, the words are not mine. These are the words of the Washington Post.

Mr. WALKER. The Washington Post?

Mr. WEBER. The normally liberal Washington Post.

It seems that the House "doesn't like the comprehensive approach" and prefers to consider each change in the criminal law as an individual matter.

The Post goes on to say in the same editorial:

Great credit is due the Senate coalition led by Senators Thurmond—

A Republican—and Biden—

who had to bargain, negotiate and compromise with opponents on both ends of the political spectrum to win passage of the bill. If they are exasperated by the cavalier decision of some House members not even to look at this package seriously, it is understandable. It won't do to pick one or two items out of hundreds of reforms and throw the rest out without any consideration. The bill put together after more than a decade of work and passed by an almost unanimous Senate deserves a respectful hearing and a thorough debate by the House.

I think that makes the case that the gentleman in the well and others of us have been making on a full range of issues over the last few weeks probably better than we possibly could.

The point is this is not necessarily even a partisan matter. The Washington Post is not usually thought of as a Republican house organ. They are in this case pointing out the absolute obstructionist tactics of the majority in stifling even discussion of serious legislation and that is truly reprehensible.

Mr. WALKER. Let me say to the gentleman that we ought to make certain that the American people understand as well what is down in the bill. I have an amendment that is in that bill that was first put in in a House Justice authorization bill, but now has been included in that Senate crime bill, that would attempt to protect our elderly citizens against crime.

One of the real tragedies in this country is the fact that many elderly Americans literally lock themselves into their homes because they are afraid of being mugged outside their doors, that they have become prisoners in this country, that regardless of the social security checks and retirement and their hopes of living in retirement, they have become virtual prisoners to the crime that is in the streets around them.

I offered some language that was adopted in this House and now has been adopted in the Senate that would attempt to speak to that issue. When this House declares that bill dead on arrival here, it means that we are not going to speak to those frustrations of elderly Americans who find themselves victimized by crime.

Now, that is tragic and as the gentleman has put it, it is absolutely reprehensible that we would have a situation where the House of Representatives in its arrogance can decide that the American people will not have crime spoken to, will not permit elderly Americans to take some of the locks off their doors and walk safely on the streets again, but instead we will continue a pattern that sees crime run rampant and Americans fears to walk across a parking lot to their cars after dusk.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to gentleman.

Mr. WEBER. And the sad point from a political perspective on this issue, as on so many others, is not necessarily the Democratic majority is going to bring it to the floor, let Members cast votes on it and then vote it down, which I would not like to see, either, but they are not even going to permit us to vote on it, so that the voters back home who are asking their Congressmen day after day, "What are you doing about crime? How come you cannot do anything about crime?" They are never going to get to know how their Member of Congress stands because the Democratic leadership of this body is going to make sure that those Members do not have to vote on this package at all, so they can never be held accountable.

Mr. WALKER. I think we want to emphasize the point the gentleman just made. We are not suggesting that Members of Congress should vote any particular way on these issues. That is up to the individual Member of Congress. He or she has to represent their districts and we are not suggesting to them how they cast their votes. We are simply suggesting that they ought to cast a vote, that somehow that should be one of the things that we judge when we go into the election next year.

We have attempted to set up means by which more and more we would be able to find out what the voting records of Members of Congress are. We have been trying to open up the process. We find ourselves frustrated by a leadership and an attitude which says that open democratic procedures in the House should not be permitted. We saw it today. We may see it again in the future. If we continue to see it, it will be an ongoing tragedy.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GINGRICH. I would like the gentleman's approval to introduce into the RECORD as part of his special order an excellent Washington Post editorial, entitled "DOA in the House?" which I think illustrates precisely what everyone here has been saying.

Mr. WALKER. This is the editorial the gentleman from Minnesota just quoted from?

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes. I think the entire address should be put in, because when a paper which is nationally regarded as a liberal newspaper, a newspaper committed normally and traditionally to the Democratic Party, a newspaper which in the past I think would have been favoring people such as the Speaker of the House, when this newspaper begins to articulate and clarify its outrage that a Member of the House closely tied to the liberal Democratic leadership would pronounce a bill on crime dead on arrival, it just seems to me that in that kind of setting that the entire editorial should be put in as part of what we are saying tonight, because I think the average citizen out there should understand that this is a great problem which even relatively liberal newspapers such as the New York Times and the Washington Post have increasingly begun to attack and that the question of dictatorship in the House and the question of a small clique of liberal Democrats strangling the public will is really a matter I think that we have to bring to people's attention. In that sense, in the tradition the gentleman is suggesting, let me briefly read this editorial, which is entitled "DOA in the House?"

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 6, 1984]

DOA IN THE HOUSE?

Does the idea of a comprehensive revision of the federal criminal code sound familiar? It should. It's been kicking around Capitol Hill since 1966, when a national commission was created to review the law and prepare a recodification. In 1971 President Nixon established a special unit in the Justice Department to continue the work of the commission, and in 1973 a bill was introduced by Sens. Hruska and McClellan. It has been reintroduced in one form or another in every Congress since.

The Senate has a history of giving serious consideration to criminal code revision. Why shouldn't it? The subject is of paramount interest to voters, the proposals are the product of long years of expert deliberation and wide-ranging hearings, and the legislative documents themselves offer tens of thousands of pages of information and recommendations. The country has invested both resources and talent in this effort, and it is certainly worthy of consideration by Congress. Why, then, when the bill passed the Senate once again last week, did some House wag pronounce it "dead on arrival" in that chamber? It seems that the House "doesn't like the comprehensive approach" and prefers to consider each change in the criminal law as an individual matter.

Over the past 18 years, proponents of comprehensive reform have made concessions in order to build consensus. This year, for example, they took a number of controversial subjects out of the bill—capital punishment, the exclusionary rule and control of the drug enforcement program, to name a few. Still, the remaining 387-page measure dealt with dozens of important issues. Sentencing and parole, bail procedures, organized crime, the insanity defense and assistance to state and local law enforcement organizations were all included. After five days of debate the measure was passed by the Senate on a vote of 91-1, a fair indication of bipartisan consensus.

Great credit is due the Senate coalition led by Sens. Thurmond and Biden, who had to bargain, negotiate and compromise with opponents on both ends of the political spectrum to win passage of the bill. If they are exasperated by the cavalier decision of some House members not even to look at this package seriously, it is understandable. It won't do to pick one or two items out of hundreds of reforms and throw the rest out without any consideration. The bill put together after more than a decade of work and passed by an almost unanimous Senate deserves a respectful hearing and a thorough debate by the House.

That was the Washington Post.

Let me just remind everyone, and I think the gentlemen who have been working here with us are particularly suited to think of this, that means that the work on this bill began the year I entered graduate school, the year some of us may have entered high school, the year others may have entered college. For our entire adult lifetime that work has been going on and yet the liberal Democratic leadership of this House, on an issue as important as crime, and drugs, and the very problems which are of concern to the average American, just allows one of their senior Members to discuss it out of hand and pronounce it dead on arrival.

I think this particular incident illustrates precisely why we are doing what we are doing.

Mr. WALKER. Let us be clear what they are saying is that has been kicking around in this House for 18 years. Now, this House has been controlled by one political party for that entire 18-year period. One political party has been in control for that entire 18-year period, and I hear some applause from the other side.

I wonder if they will applaud how street crime has increased during that 18-year period. I wonder whether they will applaud what has happened as a result of our unwillingness to do something about the criminal code of this country, because in fact during that 18-year period that has been the time during which some students have found themselves unable to go to school because their schools were no longer safe. Elderly citizens have found themselves unable to walk the streets because the streets are not safe. Women leaving shopping centers at night have found it unsafe to get into their cars and have to be escorted by a uniformed officer to have any hope whatsover of getting across a parking lot.

Those things have taken place in the last 18 years while this House has diddled and daddled around trying to do something to reform the criminal law. I do not think that that kind of 18-year record is worth very much applause.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I also am disappointed to hear the applause from one of our colleagues. What really strikes me is it is one thing to applaud because maybe this legislation has not been passed, or the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle have a different philosophical bent, but can you really applaud the fact that for 18 years the majority party has blocked even consideration of it? That does not sound like a very courageous and forthright position for any Member to take, regardless of philosophical perspective.

Mr. LELAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. LELAND. I only applauded because the gentleman made reference to the fact that the majority party has been in power for so long.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for his explanation, and I am sure we would want that on the record, because our point is that that has been an 18-year record of some tragedy, that the American people may want to think a little bit about that very fact, that for 18 years that one party has been in power and all of the things that we are referring to have taken place. Yet this Congress has done absolutely nothing on a crime bill. That is the point we were making.

Mr. LELAND. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. LELAND. I am just so glad you are in the minority and continue to hold the minority opinion about the leadership of the House.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman. What we are seeking to do is correct that.

We think that perhaps the fact that the majority party that has found itself grossly out of line with the opinions of the vast majority of Americans ought to be replaced and replaced by a leadership which is more in tune with where the majority wishes of the American people are.

I think it is very evident from everything I know that the American people are concerned about crime. I think they have been concerned about crime for 18 years. I think that on any poll that you would take in this country or in any sampling you would take you would find that people are sick and tired of being preyed upon by criminals and they want something done about it.

The point we are making is that this House has decided to do nothing for 18 years. We have done nothing, and that 18-year record of leadership is not exactly one that from our point of view deserves applause.

We think that maybe a new majority in this House, a majority more responsive to the will of the American people might in fact get a crime bill passed.

Mr. WEBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I appreciate our colleague from Texas joining in the debate because those of us on this side of the aisle who have been raising these issues have encouraged Members from your side of the aisle to join us so that we can have some kind of discussion. If the gentleman would care to respond, I would just like the gentleman's opinion: Do you think we should be able to debate and vote on a crime bill without regard to how the gentleman might vote? Does the gentleman agree we should be able to bring that package to the floor that passed the Senate by a vote of 91 to 1?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. If the gentleman does not mind yielding, let me suggest to you that I am not questioning the motives of the leadership. I have not researched the reasons for the leadership not bringing the crime bill to this body. For whatever reason. I trust the judgment of the leadership, and I applaud that judgment, for that matter, because I know that the leadership has greater wisdom than I on matters like these.

I would suggest to you that probably the leadership has been in conference with some of the people on the other side of the aisle on these very matters and will probably conclude that, indeed, it might not be timely for these matters to come to the floor.

The gentlemen here present are not omnipotent and also do not hold the only opinions about how this House should proceed. I suggest that we have survived, this institution survives and has survived for the last 18 years under the leadership of the majority party in this House and I think that we have done well.

You gentlemen obviously have some great hate for this institution for some reason or another. You keep castigating it. I do not think that is right. I think it is you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle that are always yelling and screaming for bipartisan relations and bipartisan efforts in this body, and I think that we ought to work in a bipartisan way to resolve some of these problems.

Mr. WALKER. I would simply want to say to the gentleman I do not know of anybody who would be characterized as hating this body. As a matter of fact, as a matter of fact, what we are trying to point out is things that have gone drastically wrong in this body, doctored CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, unfair committee ratios, proxy voting that amounts to ghost voting, a lot of things that have gone wrong in this body under the majority leadership. We think that those kinds of corrections would bring a great deal of credit to this body, to correct some of the errors of the past, to correct the fact that we are not speaking to legislation the American people are interested in and would, in fact, win some respect of the American people.

We find it disturbing that the body we serve in is held as one of the lowest items of respect, as one of the lowest institutions of respect among the American people. We find that very, very disturbing.

We love this body enough to believe that it should be all that it can be. One of the things it should be is democratic. It should be a body in which the individual Members who are elected and come here, 435 of us, do engage in real debate about real issues of real importance to the American people.

We think that is important and we think that that is being gradually eroded and in fact eliminated by the kind of leadership the gentleman is saying that he thinks is wise leadership.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LELAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding. The body is democratic both with a big "D" and a small "d" and I am happy to be a part of it, and a party to these discussions, as a matter of fact, and would suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman should look at the last 18 years and why it is that this body is in fact Democratic with a big "D." It is because the American people have chosen to send a majority of the Democrats to this House, and also to continue to send and reelect the House leadership. Thus I can only conclude that the intelligence level of the American people is not to be questioned.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely correct, and these gentlemen are not questioning the intelligence of the American people at all. We think that once they know the facts that they are going to change this. And one of the things we are all about is making certain that the American people now get the facts about what has really been going on in here, because what I find is many of the people do not know that Congress has abrogated to itself a license to lie in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GINGRICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GINGRICH. I want to say something which the gentleman from Texas I hope will not find offensive. But I think that it ought to be said. And in the spirit of precisely I think the good fellowship the gentleman has shown all evening.

Any member of the Black Caucus should understand precisely what we are talking about. What I was told today is there is one committee which has a staff ratio on salaries of $7 for the Democrats for every $1 in that committee spent on Republican staff. That is just plain discrimination. That discriminates against every citizen in America who is in a district that happens to have a Republican Representative.

I think, as the gentleman knows, we did not come to engage in a discussion of the Black Caucus on the floor, but to bring other issues that we think are important to the floor. But the gentleman should be one of those who most understands our frustration and our sense of rage and our sense of impotence.

Quite candidly, I think the House is a great institution. I think it is a marvelous institution. And I think over the last few years since 1974 the Speaker of this House has gradually brought into his hands all of the people that Joe Cannon once had.

This is structurally the most powerful Speaker we have seen since 1910. He got up on the floor this fall and said something which if he said it to you you probably would be out leading some demonstration.

□ 1950

He said to everyone on this side of the room: "I control the schedule, I," the Speaker, "and I will bring up anything I want to any time I want to."

Now, that is a level of unfairness and in fact it was a sneak attack. They did not have the decency with 24 hours' notice to tell us when they were bringing up issues.

I would think that the Black Caucus or any group in this body, with the record that you have developed over the years of fighting for everyone to have a fair chance, and every American to have an equal opportunity, that you, of all people, could appreciate in that spirit why we are simply asking for a fair break.

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. If I may respond, if the gentleman is such a champion of the cause of the Black Caucus I would suggest that the gentleman should communicate more with the other people on that side of the aisle on some of the issues that we are most concerned with because it seems that the issues, most of the issues that we are most concerned with, particularly those priority issues, it turns out every time they come to the floor of this Congress the majority of the other side, the Republican Members of this House, tend to vote against us in the Black Caucus.

So do not give me that business about empathy with a minority party over there until you start substantially supporting our issues.

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask the gentleman for a second because maybe I do not understand the polls that I see and the people that I talk with.

When I go back home and I talk with Americans who happen to be black, they tell me, for example, by overwhelming margins they favor prayer in school, they would like to see prayer in school; they tell me they are worried about crime; they do not want their children to become cocaine addicts. They tell me that in fact they have many concerns. They would like more take-home pay. they do not want their taxes raised.

Now, I may not be a member of the Black Caucus and my understanding is under your rules I would not be admitted, but in terms of my concern for fundamental values that black Americans share that I will not yield an inch to any member of the Black Caucus.

We may disagree with economic policy; you may be more liberal than I am. But that is not a question of the terms of the fundamental value that I will bet you in you district in Texas if you were to run a poll and you were to ask the black Americans who you happen to represent how they feel about prayer in school, the overwhelming majority, 80 percent of them would say in fact they are in favor of prayer in school.

So while we may disagree about some economic issues, I think there are many ways we agree, and I think black Americans would agree on a simple question of fairness.

We are not asking you to always vote with us, but we are asking you at least to press your leadership to give us a fair chance.

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. I would like to respond by saying to the gentleman that the Black Caucus members are elected by usually a majority of black people in their districts and we represent the interests of black people hopefully in the best way that they can be represented. And I would suggest to you that those issues that you talked to are not necessarily priority issues.

We are struggling for survival and for the most part when we are talking about fundamentals, for the most part, the economic issues that you do not support us on are the ones that are more fundamental to us than the issues that you have talked about.

How is it that we can be that concerned about prayer in schools when in fact our people are hungry? When, as a matter of fact, people in your administration suggest that there is no hunger in America when we know there is hunger in our districts?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Not to react to the hunger thing, because I think——

Mr. LELAND. I am sorry?

Mr. MACK. I say not to react to the hunger thing, because I think that was really out of order with what we are talking about here. I want to say to you that it seems to me that the most significant thing——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) has expired.

AGENDA FOR THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. WEBER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. I just want to finish a point with the gentleman from Texas, but I think really the most fundamental thing that really holds us all together, black and white, Democrat and Republican, conservative and liberal, is in fact the strength that comes from the spirit which we learned, at least I learned from prayer in school. And I say that when all things are really difficult, when times are tough, when the economic trails are against you, that the thing that keeps us all going is the spirit and if we do not let our children learn that from very young ages, then we have taken something away from them very significant, and something that would be very, very hard to replace.

Mr. WEBER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. Let me suggest to you that I am not here to debate the issue of prayer in schools, that I was only responding to the gentleman's reference to me about certain fundamental issues that he considers to be priorities as opposed to what the Congressional Black Caucus considers to be a priority.

Mr. WEBER. If I may reclaim my time just a minute, everyone has a right, obviously, to judge the interests of their own constituents accordingly, but the gentleman from Georgia I think makes a valid point in the fact that poll after poll after poll shows that on those issues that the gentleman from Georgia made reference to, as well as other issues, the opinions of black Americans are not in tune with the opinions expressed by members of the Black Caucus on some of those issues.

Granted, the gentleman from Texas may be correct, they are not the highest priority. Let me give you one example, an issue that I am interested in is the pro life issue. I take a pro life stand on the abortion issue.

In most public opinion surveys taken since the Supreme Court decision in 1973, the most antiabortion subgroup are black males. Yet, as I am sure the gentleman knows, most of the members of the congressional Black Caucus, for reasons of principle, I am sure, take an opposite point of view.

All we are trying to suggest is that those of us on this side of the aisle sometimes vote somewhat differently than members of the Black Caucus, also believe we are reflecting views of sometimes black constituents as well.

I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I hope the gentleman is not suggesting, too, that black people come to the Congress only to represent black views.

Mr. WEBER. Certainly not.

Mr. LELAND. We have various issues. Several members of the Black Caucus who are elected by a majority of white districts. Myself, I do not represent a black district. I represent a district that has a minority of blacks, as a matter of fact. And so do some of my other colleagues; KATIE HALL, ALAN WHEAT, RON DELLUMS, and I could go on as to other members of the congressional Black Caucus.

Thus we get elected by people who do not just—who are not just black and hold opinions about black people necessarily but, rather, represent varied districts.

What I am trying to say to you is that we come to Congress as equal citizens of this country to serve the interests of America, not just black views; black people and their interests are a high priority for us, of course, but my suggestion indeed was that after being given the analogy that the Republican Party in this body is in a similar situation to the Black Caucus is absurd as far as I am concerned because, indeed, that body that is not empathetic with us; the minority party, if you will, does not support overwhelmingly or in the majority, the majority of time, the issues that we put forward in this body. So for us to be prodded into being interested in the minority's plight in this body is rather futile.

Mr. WEBER. Reclaiming my time, if I may, there is a substantive difference. Granted the gentleman's point that we differ philosophically on the issues. The point we have been trying to make is that for a long time the agenda, supported by the Black Caucus among others, was blocked from consideration in this Congress, in this institution. And black Americans in Congress, black Americans generally were in the forefront of every move that sought to open up this Congress.

In fact, one of the devices that we have sought to use, the Calendar Wednesday device, was used extensively in the 1950's by liberal Members of the House of Representatives to bring to the House floor civil rights legislation which was being blocked by the Speaker.

In that sense our colleague from Georgia suggested, I think quite properly, that members of the Black Caucus who have rightly identified the use of the system to block consideration of their agenda in the past, should at least empathize with us when we say that the system is now being used to block action or accountability on our agenda as well.

I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Let me just make a couple of points. First of all I want to make the comment that the comment I made a moment ago about the spirit was because even though you and I have known each other for a short period of time there is a connection and I knew that what were not saying that you were a person who was not concerned about prayer in school. And I wanted to have that opportunity to express that.

The other thing is that what I would like to state now, though, is that maybe people ought to ask the question: What are we doing here at 8 o'clock on Wednesday evening discussing these issues? Why was this not done during the day? Why did we not start the legislative day until 3 o'clock this afternoon?

□ 2000

I would like a response. I guess I can give the gentleman a little information. I mean, we are here tonight talking about prayer in school. We have mentioned and talked about the balanced budget amendment, the line-item veto. We have talked about the crime package.

But the point that I am making is that we are having to do that at the end of the legislative day because we are not given the right to talk about those issues that we are concerned with and the people from our districts are saying they are concerned with.

And that is our job. That is our responsibility, to come here to Congress and talk about those issues.

Mr. WEBER. If I may reclaim my time briefly, I think the gentleman makes a good point. We have, under the rules of this House, procedures that allow for these Special Orders that are taken after the House has concluded business.

Many Members ask why we take this time. And the point is precisely what our colleague from Florida just said that this at least gives us an opportunity to debate those issues. Now we are still denied the fundamental opportunity which is to vote on those issues and that is what we would like.

I would just like to thank the gentleman from Texas for being one of the very few Members of the Democratic majority that would at least come down here and give us some opportunity to discuss and debate those issues, because we are sincere in our concern. We are not down here trying to harass the majority. We are not down here trying to simply score debating points.

We genuinely think that there is a agenda that the America people care about that is not being considered by this House of Representatives and it is not likely to be considered by this House of Representatives. And this is the only forum available to us to at least bring those issues to the floor for debate, if not for any kind of action.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the gentleman from Minnesota in thanking the gentleman from Texas for the spirit in which he engaged in debate tonight. I think it has been a useful experience from my viewpoint and hopefully from his viewpoint as well. I would join the gentleman from Minnesota in thanking the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. If the gentleman would yield to me, I appreciate the remarks from both gentlemen and I would like to say to the gentleman that invited I would always be here to offer my input, if you will. I have no fear of avoiding issues, if you will.

But I would like to go back to the original discussion in terms of the openness and the analogy between the Black Caucus and the minority party in this body.

The fact of the matter is that the gentleman is presuming that under the premise that indeed we agree that there is no openness in the body. I, for one, believe that there is an openness and a justice about this body.

Mr. WEBER. If I may reclaim my time, how can the gentleman then explain the fact that the school prayer amendment that we have been discussing has been around for 21 years and has not been voted on in this body since I became an adult?

Mr. LELAND. I am not the historian that the gentleman is, but I would tell the gentleman that for whatever reason the fact of the matter is that politics as they are play a very integral part in this body.

Mr. WEBER. If I may reclaim my time, this is why the gentleman from Georgia, a few minutes ago, expressed such outrage because forget about even the Black Caucus agenda for a minute. If this was a piece of legislation that the gentleman from Texas felt was of high, high priority and I gave him the same response that the gentleman just gave me and said, well, you know, it is politics and there are some reasons why, the gentleman would be enraged. The gentleman would not accept that answer for a second.

Mr. LELAND. But I accept the reality. The reality is that this body is made up of politicians and thus we, like in a chess game, play with those issues as much as anybody does. Just like the minority party. The minority party uses all kinds of ploys to get its point across in this body, as well as the majority body. I find nothing wrong with that, nothing terribly immoral about that.

The other point I would like to make, if I can, if the gentleman will yield further, and that is that I have heard the gentleman and his colleagues kicking on the leadership in the House and beating up on them verbally. I always learned from my mother and other people who have been examples to me that you catch flies with honey. You do not go and beat up on somebody.

I suggest that the gentleman has been—and the gentleman before me—has been shooting from the hip and has not yielded any kind remarks toward the leadership at all. The gentleman has not given the leadership of this body any credit for anything.

So I would suggest to the gentleman that the leadership is not going to play ball with the gentleman as long as he does that.

My advice to the gentleman, if the gentleman will accept that, I think I have some speck of wisdom. I have been in politics now for some time, almost 12 years. I have always been able to achieve a whole lot more by sitting down and talking to people and being more civil with them as opposed to getting up on the well of the House and lambasting my colleagues. I have done that on several occasions and have reaped unfortunate products of that lambasting, too.

But I suggest that the gentleman ought to be a little kinder to the leadership. The reality is that the leadership is here. And I would suggest to the gentleman that probably given the political winds as they are that the majority party is going to stay in power for some time in the future.

So if in fact the minority party has some grievances that they ought to sit down with the leadership. Not just the minority leader and the leadership of the minority, but some of the gentlemen here who constantly on a daily basis sometimes get up and lambast the majority party, the majority leadership. Sit down and talk to them about some of the concerns that you have, particularly some of the younger Members. Sit down and talk to them. You will find that they are not really the evil guys or monsters that some of you are suggesting that they are. They are willing to help you because they love this institution. And to challenge them you are challenging the institution itself.

Mr. WEBER. I appreciate the gentleman's point of view but the fact is historically there have been times when this institution has been improperly used and when the rules have been abused by the majority party, whatever that majority party has been at the time, to block action on the will of the people.

The example of Speaker Joe Cannon earlier in this century is probably the best known. The power of King Caucus is something that all Americans read about in their history books. And the fact is this institution from time to time does become, in a sense of the word, corrupted.

And then there have been reform movements that we have looked back on very favorably historically that have sought to open the institution up to seek action on the people's agenda. And more recently again, as I pointed out, I think that was true of the civil rights agenda in the fifties and early sixties.

Although I have no personal animosity toward the members of the Democratic leadership, most of us who are trying to make this point are looking at legislation that has not been acted on for decades, 21 years in the case of the school prayer amendment, 18 years in the case of criminal code reform. And we frankly have a hard time believing that now all it is going to take is some friendly conversations and a little olive branch extended to the Speaker and the majority. I simply think that there is no likelihood of that and instead maybe we need to bring home to the American people a little more clearly exactly which party it is that is preventing action on their agenda.

We as Republicans cannot prevent action on any agenda item that is a priority of the Democratic Party. We vote day after day on the Democratic Party agenda and that is as it should be. I would not seek to prevent any issue from coming to the floor regardless of how politically tough it is. We have to vote on the domestic content bill year after year, which has no chance of getting passed and becoming law, but you want to put us all on record.

I had to vote a couple of weeks ago on the weatherization bill, very popular in my part of the country, but in my judgment it was a budget buster. So I voted against it.

We have to vote on all these tough issues that are on the Democratic agenda.

But the agenda that we think has support among the American people, overwhelming support in most cases, is not brought to the floor of this House. And, with all due respect to the recommendations of our colleague from Texas, I simply think that the time of talking nicely about these issues has passed and it is time to shout a little bit.

Mr. LELAND. I guess I can only wish the gentleman well. Keep on shouting, keep on lambasting the majority leadership and keep on having the problems that you are having. I can only tell the gentleman that he ought to look for some alternatives to what he is doing because it is not working, obviously. It has not worked for 18 years, so look for some alternatives.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for his comments. But I think what we have tried for 18 years is business as usual. As I talked to my constituents they think the Congress is engaged in business as usual.

And I would suggest to the gentleman that what we are trying out is breaking out of the pattern of business as usual. If we have tried for 18 to 21 years of business as usual without success, I think we deserve to give this experiment in applying a little pressure to try to see if we cannot open up the House on some items that are on the American people's agenda, I think we should give that tactic a little more time than a few weeks.

Mr. LELAND. Let me tell the gentleman that the people of my district love the House leadership. I am one who believes—by the way next week, all of next week, I am holding town hall meetings in my district because I have been afforded that opportunity. The people are looking forward to my coming home. Not on holiday, not to go off on some trip, but rather to travel to my district to inform my people about what has been going on in the last session and what is happening now as we begin this new session and as we proceed.

But when I go home, I talk about what is going on in this body, particularly what is going on in this House, and I inform the people as to what the leadership is doing, what the minority is doing, what I have been doing, and the people can judge for themselves. Overwhelmingly in my district the people continue to reelect me, for some reason, and I suspect that that is because they appreciate what I have done.

I am a member of the majority party in this body, and the people in my district continue to reelect me. Obviously, they feel some confidence in the fact that I represent their views as they want me to. So they are pretty happy.

I realize that in your districts the people might not like the majority leadership or the majority party. But we all represent different interests. I would say again that the majority of the people in this body happen to have been elected by the majority party in this House.

Mr. WEBER. Reclaiming my time for a minute, I have to restate an important point. All of us as Republicans run for reelection in our districts with a full record available to our constituents, having voted on every item that is on the Democratic agenda.

With all due respect to the gentleman, who I am sure represents his district very well, that is not true of the Democrats. They do not go to their voters with a record of having voted on items that are on the Republican agenda and justify their votes to their constituents, because we do not bring many of those items to the floor because the leadership of your party refuses to permit us to have votes on those issues.

If you believe that our political system is the best, then there has to be some degree to which both parties are permitted to compete effectively in the marketplace of ideas.

We understand that the majority party has the right to run the House of Representatives. But we are suggesting that it is an abuse of power to systematically prevent the American people from being able to judge a majority of the Members of this body in their votes on issues that consistently show a majority support from the American people, like school prayer, balanced budget, line-item veto, criminal code reform, immigration reform, bankruptcy reform, all of these issues that never come here to be voted on, because they are not on the agenda of the Democratic majority.

I cannot help but say that I think that is an abuse of power on the part of the majority. The majority has the power to bring those bills to the floor and then defeat them if they think they are bad law. They can bring the school prayer amendment to the floor of the House and use the votes that they have as the majority party to defeat school prayer, and then if they do not think it is a good idea, it will not become law. But they do not do that. They do not permit us even to vote on it. And that is the point where we have a fundamental problem with the action of the majority.

Mr. LELAND. The institution is supported by the American people. Obviously the American people believe in what is happening here, because otherwise the American people would not elect a majority party to be in power in this body.

Mr. WEBER. Reclaiming my time again, the gentleman is not necessarily correct. The American people, of course, go and vote for one of two candidates that is offered to them; but I am sure the gentleman has seen public opinion polls that show an alarming decline in the basic confidence of the American people in this institution.

Our colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I think made reference to that a few minutes ago.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. The most recent polls show that 16 percent of the American people have any kind of favorable view of this body.

Mr. WEBER. What was that percent? Sixteen percent?

Mr. WALKER. Sixteen percent. Which would mean that 84 percent of the American people do not regard this body very highly.

That has to be disturbing to all of us who think highly of the Constitution and representative government that it embodies. When that kind of low opinion exists in the country of this institution, something has got to be wrong, and the American people have got to be saying, in that kind of data, that something has gone drastically wrong.

Mr. WEBER. It is further reflected, of course, in voting statistics.

I am sure the gentleman is concerned about the alarmingly low voter turnout that we have in this country compared to other Western nations. And this lack of confidence in the people's House, this basic institution of government that is supposed to be most responsible to the people, has to reflect on the way we are doing business here.

Mr. LELAND. If the gentleman will yield further, let me ask the gentleman then, in those polls he is talking about, is it not true, however, that, although there is a low popularity quotient as far as the institution itself is concerned or the Congress itself, because of some image that the people perceive this House as being or this body as being, is it not true that, in the same polls that have been taken, there is a high favorability rate, a high popularity rate that is given to the individual Members of Congress?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Texas is absolutely correct in that. The people tend to give their individual Members of Congress a very, very high mark. They see them as being representative of their districts, and so on.

That also, though, speaks to the problem around here, because one of the reasons why those favorable ratings are so high is because we have million dollar budgets to operate with. We are able to mail into our districts all the time; we are able to go out and hold town meetings that we mail to people on; we are able to do radio shows; we are able to do television spots; we are able to do all of those things that a challenging candidate in those districts has very little opportunity to do, who has to raise awfully big bucks just in order to be somewhat even to challenge an incumbent Member of Congress.

For the minority party, that represents a big gap. It means that we start off with 100 people more who have to achieve that challenger status to incumbent Members of Congress. Incumbent Members of Congress do not have that rating from the American people in a vacuum; incumbent Members of Congress have that because we have the ability to communicate better than practically anybody else in this society with a block of 500,000 people.

So the gentleman is correct in that polling data, but it has to be disturbing that having said that their individual Member of Congress is a great guy, they then turn around and say that the Congress as a whole stinks.

Mr. WEBER. If the gentleman will allow me to reclaim my time for a minute, it is because of precisely the system we have been talking about here today that you can have this phenomenon, where people are frustrated with Congress, they do not think it gets anything done, they cannot understand why they do not act on major legislation, they cannot understand why they do not deal with problems. But the individual Member of Congress is never held accountable for that. Part of the reason, of course, is because he never has to hold up his voting record on a number of issues that are of great importance to the American people.

So the system we have been describing here today produces just the phenomenon that the gentleman from Texas describes, where the institution itself is held in very low esteem but individual Members in their districts are thought to be OK because, of course, they go home and say, "Well, gee, John and Sally, I am, of course, in favor of school prayer, and I am doing whatever I can for it." There is no voting record to show that he has ever voted against it because the leadership manages to make sure that that has never come up for a vote. In that way, the institution is blamed but the individual Member is preserved. It is truly an incumbent's game, and it is not a good game for the American people and it is not a good game for this institution.

I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LELAND. I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

I would just like to close my remarks by saying that I appreciate the allowance of my participation in this colloquy. But I strongly disagree with all of the gentlemen who have said that this House has been so unduly unfair to them, and I feel very strongly that the gentlemen have opportunities to present their views through the committee process and other processes of this body.

I understand the frustration that the gentlemen probably have. But all I can tell you is that those people out there in the public do not just read those newsletters that we send out, they do not just come to the town hall meetings and feel good about what we represent as individuals in this body just because we are there, but rather because we do present them with issues such as you have been talking about. And I have been confronted with those very issues that the gentleman has talked about. I have given those people my views, my people, my constituents, about those issues.

To suggest that we have to debate those issues on the floor is not necessarily the only way that we are judged on those issues, but rather we are judged in campaigns, in town-hall meetings and in other forums that are organized in the district, whether they are organized by my office or by civic clubs and other groups in my district. I have to respond. I have to be responsible and responsive to the people of my district. They judge me by that. That is where the popularity comes from, that is where the favorability quotient comes from, not just because we have so much money to spend, and that kind of thing. You will find that I am probably as fiscally conservative as anybody in this House when it comes to spending money out of my budget. But at the same time my people continue to send me here. And when they decide that I do not belong here, when they decide to send a Republican, or another Democrat, for that matter, then I will walk away gracefully and say that I have done the best job that I could have but at the same time I will have to face the reality that the American people in my district do not want me here. And that is the reality that you have to face. At some point you are going to have to figure out how to gracefully, whether you believe it is the way or not, to appeal to the majority leadership. And the majority leadership, I would say, represents this institution well, whether you like it or not.

I believe strongly, and I say this from the depths of my heart, that the members of the majority party who represent the leadership here love this institution as much as anybody in this House, on whatever side you want to sit. They try to protect the integrity of this institution the best they can.

Sure, they have ideological differences, sure, they have partisan differences, and sure, they have all kinds of differences, because as someone said, to err is human. We are all humans. We are all human beings who make up this body. We make up rules and policies and things like that in order that we can proceed in an orderly manner in this society.

This body, this House of Representatives, the people's House, is the greatest House in the world. Whatever thoughts we might have, and whatever faults the Speaker of the House might have, the majority leader, the majority whip, whatever faults that they might have, I would like you to put them next to anybody else in other bodies around the world and compare what it is that we have in this country. I would suggest that you would come up, the minority party, with the suggestion that we have the greatest body in the world. I do not think that you would deny that. I do not think that you can deny that.

So I think that we have to impart some of that to the people out there who are listening to our views, that as faulty as we are as human beings, as faulty as we are being partisan players in this body, we still have the greatest institution there is. I think that this body is greater than the other body on the other side of the Capitol because, indeed, we represent at the very basic level the people, the one-man, the one-woman, one-vote concept. It is the most democratic concept that has ever been created by humankind and we continue to impart that and execute that principle more than any other body, led by the majority leadership here.

So I would be careful about how we castigate that leadership and suggest that what we need to do is possibly sit down and look at some alternatives if, in fact, you have consternation about what is going on in this body, as opposed to being just so antagonistic that there is no reasonability derived here.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for his statement, and I again thank the gentleman for his participation in this special order this evening, although I have to come again to a substantially different conclusion than the gentleman from Texas, because we have again concluded a week of action or inaction here in the House of Representatives, and we are going to adjourn tomorrow and go home for another week for a break after being in session for only 3 weeks.

I was back home in my district during the month of January holding town meetings and listening to my constituents and I heard great frustration about a whole range of issues. Now I am going to go back again next week saying we have not dealt with a single one of those issues, hearing that same frustration, and explain to them that when we go back into session we probably still will not deal with those issues.

With all due respect to the leadership of this House, I think ultimately the fact of the low esteem in which the public holds the Congress is something for which the majority party must share some blame. It is in that spirit that we try to bring these issues to the floor for debate and that we will continue to try to confront and try to urge the majority leadership to change their actions.

I thank the gentleman from Texas for his participation, and the other gentlemen who have participated in this special order.

REAFFIRMING COMMITMENT TO SCIENTIFIC PEER REVIEW PROCESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution with the distinguished ranking minority member of the Science and Technology Committee, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. WINN), that reaffirms our commitment to the scientific peer review process.

This country's preeminence in scientific research can be maintained only if the scientific review process, established over three decades ago, remains unfettered. This process insures that the funding of scientific research proposals is based solely upon scientific criteria. Proposals for the expenditure of our limited financial resources are forced to prove their scientific value against other competing proposals. In this manner, only those proposals deemed to be meritorious, after appropriate review by the scientific community, are recommended to be funded.

Each year many worthy scientific projects are abandoned or deferred for lack of funds. Each such instance represents to some degree, a technological risk for the United States. It is therefore essential that the advice of our leading experts be sought on establishing priorities, to insure the most essential and promising projects are funded. Failure to follow such procedure leads invariably to a widespread preception that success in the competition for Federal research funds is less dependent on scientific merit than on having the right connections.

Recent actions by this body have called into question our commitment to peer review process and have threatened the fragile and unique relationship between the Federal Government and the university community. In response to this situation, the National Academy of Sciences, the American Association of Universities, and the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, have adopted resolutions that call upon the Congress to reaffirm its support of the peer review process and to refrain from actions that would make scientific decisions a test of political influence rather than judgment of the quality of the work to be done.

This resolution is in response to their request, I would urge my colleagues to join in cosponsorship of this resolution and restore the peer review process.●

WHAT THE NEW BUDGET MEANS FOR THE PEOPLE OF CLEVELAND AND OHIO

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR) is recognized for 45 minutes.

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, Congress received the President's new budget for fiscal year 1985 last week. It is a voluminous document that is overwhelming to the average citizen. Many ask, "How do the budget's avalanche of numbers, the millions spent on this and the millions cut from that, affect me? What does the budget mean for me and my children today and in the future?"

I understand this feeling of confusion. Yet it is important that people know what the numbers mean and what they tell us. For the Federal budget is like a roadmap. The President uses it to tell us what he wants to do, what type of future he wants to give our people, what his priorities are and what he really cares about.

I would like to take a few moments to put the President's new budget in perspective for my constituents in Greater Cleveland and the people of Ohio and answer some of these questions.

What does the budget mean for Ohio? Today, Ohio ranks 45th in the Nation in its rate of return on the Federal tax dollar. In simple terms, this means that the people of Ohio receive 79 cents for every dollar sent to Washington. Put another way, Ohioans receive $5 billion less from the Federal Government than they contribute in taxes. The budget the President has sent to Congress does nothing to change Ohio's status as a donor State despite the severe economic conditions that have affected the State since the late seventies.

The President's budget actually reduces funds for Ohio. It calls for dramatic cuts in such major programs as food stamps and aid to families with dependent children. It recommends no change in funding levels for such critical programs as medicaid, revenue sharing, the community development block grant and the Job Training and Partnership Act programs and the low-income energy assistance block grant program.

When inflation is taken into account, we find that Federal funding has, in reality, been cut by at least 4 to 5 percent in these areas. In the medicaid program, the cut is much deeper. Last year, medical care inflation was 8.7 percent, requiring the States to spend even more on health care.

The one area where Ohio registered a small but real gain in Federal help was in highway planning and construction money. Funding to help rebuild the State's bridges and roads will increase by at least 6 percent in the new budget. This is due to the concerted efforts of the entire Ohio congressional delegation to improve the State's position during House consideration in late 1982 of the nickel gas tax. As you recall, the administration agreed, because of delegation pressure, to increase Ohio's return of Federal highway money from 61 cents on every dollar we send out of State to 85 cents. This was achieved by forcing a recalculation of the formula that distributes Federal highway money. Our goal was to move Ohio closer to receiving its fair share of Federal dollars.

I have included a table in my statement that shows what Ohio can expect to receive under many of the Federal formula programs in the President's fiscal 1985 budget. Following is the table:

[6] The low-income home energy assistance program will receive no appropriations in fiscal year 1985. Instead the administration proposes and will submit legislation later this year to finance the program from the petroleum overcharge restitution fund. The administration estimates that the same amount of money will be available through this fund as was appropriated for fiscal 1984. Accordingly, this estimate is based on the assumption that Ohio would receive the same amount of money under the new program. However, legislative specifications are not available at this time.
[7] Department of Transportation, Budget Office.
[8] U.S. Department of Labor, Northeast-Midwest Coalition.

These budget estimates for fiscal 1985 carry a twofold message to the people of Ohio. The first is that the continued cuts in Federal aid mean that Ohio and its citizens will bear an increasingly large burden of paying for programs that really should be shared more equitably with the Federal Government. Health care, welfare, education, community development, urban transportation, and energy costs are national problems and responsibilities. Job creation and giving our workers the skills for new jobs are also national problems and national responsibilities. Ohio and its citizens cannot shoulder the increasingly heavy burden that is being shifted from Washington. We simply do not have the financial resources. During its long years of prosperity, Ohio contributed its tax dollars to help less fortunate sections of our country. Today, Ohio needs help if it is to reinvigorate its economy and once again become an economic dynamo.

The second message is that the Ohio congressional delegation must work tirelessly to increase the State's share of Federal aid. This is absolutely critical. The Federal formulas that are the basis for determining how much money Ohio receives must be rewritten to reflect Ohio's problems, needs, and changed condition. It is an anachronism to consider Ohio a donor State when its unemployment rate remains well above the national level, when the State's infrastructure is crumbling, and when many of its smokestack industries remain smokeless.

Even cuts in national programs such as medicare are deeply felt in Ohio. Let us examine the case of medicare which over 1.3 million elderly Ohioans rely on to help cover their medical costs.

The President's new budget proposes a $1 billion cut in the medicare program by increasing out-of-pocket expense for medicare premiums, deductibles, and copayments. Our aged now pay 15 percent of their annual income on medical care. They can expect to pay more if the President's medicare changes are accepted.

This is what the President intends to do:

Delay by 1 month all elderly citizen's coverage by the medicare program. The administration plans to delay coverage until the first full month after a person reaches age 65.

Freeze physician reimbursement for 1 year. The administration, however, does not ask that physicians be forbidden from passing additional costs on to the elderly patient.

Increase premium costs for medicare part B to $78 from $75. The President plans to add additional dollar or two increases for every year thereafter. This deductible must be paid before the patient's medical bills will be covered by the program.

Allow each beneficiary the option of accepting a medicare voucher which they could then use to purchase their own private health insurance. The healthier and wealthier elderly patients will undoubtedly move to private insurers, leaving the poorer patients with higher medical bills in the medicare program.

If Ohio is hurt by the President's new budget, Greater Cleveland is hurt even more. A look at the following three important programs shows what our people can expect:

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT BLOCK GRANTS

Cleveland received $32 million from that program in fiscal 1982. This money is being used for city parks, sewers, bridges, and roads, the type of infrastructure projects that make a city livable and foster economic development. In fiscal 1985, we can expect the same amount that we received 3 years earlier. But when we take inflation into account, that $32 million actually turns out to be a deep reduction of more than 10 percent.

REVENUE SHARING

Cleveland received $13.8 million in Federal revenue sharing funds in fiscal 1982. In fiscal 1985, we can expect to receive $13.5 million, a 2-percent decrease before inflation. However, if we consider inflation, the cut turns out to be at least 10 percent, money that the city can ill afford to lose.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Grants to Cleveland from the U.S. Economic Development Administration in fiscal 1982 totaled $3 million. This money has been used for local economic development and job creation. Specifically, Cleveland has used EDA funds for completion of the Lee-Seville Industrial Park, the improvement of Midtown Park, the installation of water and sewer lines in Cleveland's East Side and loans to small businesses. However, the President has called for the elimination of EDA. Our city cannot afford this loss.

NASA'S LEWIS RESEARCH CENTER

The Lewis Research Center faces a $40 million cut for two programs under the President's new budget. Loss of these funds would eliminate research to develop a fuel-efficient turboprop airplane engine and hamper work on an advanced communications satellite. NASA is spending $35 million this year on both programs. These cuts affect Ohio companies that receive subcontracts from the projects and make it more difficult for Greater Cleveland to attract and spawn new businesses whose work may relate to the work performed at Lewis. You might say that the Lewis cuts could have a chilling effect on the area's economic outlook.

There is one additional area where administration budget cuts concern me. This involves help to our less fortunate citizens who have been battered by the deep recession.

The administration calls for a cut of over a half billion dollars from the fiscal 1985 budget for food stamps.

That cut amounts to an effective reduction of 9 percent when inflation is included. For Ohio, it means a loss of tens of millions of dollars. Last year, the Federal Government cut Ohio's food stamp program by $40 million, a real cut of 4.8 percent.

The State, its localities, and its citizens cannot afford this cut at a time when the number of hungry and homeless people who seek food and meals at shelters and food banks continues to rise ever higher. I checked recently with the Cleveland Food Bank and the Salvation Army to see how many people are seeking food assistance.

John Barnicle, assistant director of the Cleveland Food Bank, reported,

We're distributing over 600,000 pounds of food a month to area agencies as of February 1984, double the amount we distributed for the same period a year ago.

Major Paul Kelly of the Salvation Army said that the Salvation Army served food to 88,421 people in Cuyahoga County last December, up from 37,128 people in January 1983. That means a 138-percent increase in the number of people needing food help in just 11 months.

Mr. Speaker, this is a preliminary review of what the President's new budget means for Ohio and Greater Cleveland. We will learn more as we get further along in the budget process.

What I wanted to do today was to discuss some of the high points of the President's budget and give the people of Ohio and Greater Cleveland an understanding of the outlines of the President's roadmap.

I am taking the liberty of attaching background figures on the impact of previous administration budget decisions on Ohio, Cleveland and Ohio's 20th Congressional District. Following are charts and tables:

THE EDB CONTROVERSY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker. I wanted to take this opportunity to discuss some of the issues surrounding the current controversy over the use of ethylene dibromide (EDB). I am including some material in the RECORD which details background information on EDB and the recent Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) decision on EDB.

As chairman of the House Agriculture Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture, I have been holding hearings for the last 3 years on the EPA pesticide regulatory program authorized by the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA). This is one of the most complicated areas of Federal statute and is one which encompasses all of the difficulties which this body faces in dealing with toxic chemical regulation.

The problems surrounding the current controversy over EDB and symptomatic of the larger set of problems which we face. While the process of regulatory decision making is still ongoing at EPA, the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), and the Department of Agriculture (USDA), we can begin to draw some conclusions about policy issues in this area.

First, let me state that the subcommittee has been monitoring this situation for over a year now. The agencies involved are aware of the subcommittee's concern and our desire to see the pesticide regulatory system avoid EDB-type emergencies. We have not, to date, held public hearings on the issue due to a policy of avoiding hearings on specific chemicals and their decisions at EPA. What we have attempted to do is fit individual decisions and actions into a broader context to better deal with generic problems which are forcing specific controversy. As a veteran of over 10 years of being forced to deal with a series of emergencies, I am trying to force EPA, and the Congress, to look beyond the "pesticide of the month."

In the case of EDB, a number of broader issues arise. First, there is the general problem which surrounds any attempt to set a cancer policy in Government. Any move into this area brings science squarely into the political arena and makes the use of unbiased scientific fact very difficult. Deliberations about safe levels of exposure, risk analysis, risk management, and the host of other scientific questions take on political and economic consequence.

As the subcommittee has examined on numerous occasions, the question of an acceptable cancer risk has yet to be properly debated. There are informal standards set at EPA that a risk of an additional cancer of one in a million is a threshold of risk which sets in place certain regulatory actions. Yet that may or may not be proper level and even this threshold is one which has shown some flexibility in the past. Even if there were a fixed threshold of unacceptable risk, we find that EPA is ill-prepared to deal with this situation. We have been told by EPA that 85 percent of the currently registered chemicals do not have a complete set of tests done on them as required by current law. EDB is an example of an old chemical which has been grandfathered in and does not have a complete data package.

But we must also be careful to separate our risk analysis from risk management. We may find that a substance is a dangerous one, but one for which there are ways to properly manage those risks to mitigate any danger to the public. Conversely, we may have a mildly dangerous substance which, improperly managed, can pose a greater risk to public health and safety. We also may have certain groups or subpopulations which need greater management of the risks due to some unique circumstance which this group shares. In the case of EDB, and the alternatives which have been proposed for it, the greater challenge for us is to carefully examine the risk management side of the equation now that we have finally collected additional information about the risk analysis side.

In the case of EDB we have an interesting problem which is occuring with increasing frequency. We have an old chemical which, due to assumptions made about it not entering the food stream and due to old measurement technologies, was not covered under the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act. We have since learned that EDB does show up in food because we finally began testing for it and began to pick up residues of parts per billion (p.p.b.). We are finding that prior assumptions, upon which current law is based, may not be correct.

With EDB, we found ourselves on relatively new ground concerning enforcement of any residue tolerances set for EDB and found that neither EPA nor FDA had clear authority to act as they might have with a newer chemical. What is needed is an updating of our assumptions and data based upon current knowledge. We cannot allow ourselves to be forced to action by today's crisis. As we have learned with EDB, the cost is too great. Farmers, consumers, pesticide manufacturers, and the Federal Government all suffer each time we get caught napping as we did with EDB.

We have another problem which results from our delay in dealing with EDB. The problems with EDB have been formally known since 1975, yet we have done very little about developing alternatives to EDB either for soil fumigation on in postharvest treatments. We now have farmers who, with few alternatives to EDB for soil fumigation, face a very thin line of defense against nematodes which can cause great crop losses. We have alternatives available for postharvest and quarantine fumigation, but each of these chemicals is under some form of inquiry about its toxicity. We can expect that critical examination of existing alternatives will increase in the light of the EDB crisis.

Since 1976, USDA has spent about $4 million on research into alternatives to EDB fumigation. However, this was not a high priority area of research until the EDB issue became infamous during the Medfly crisis. There are potential alternatives to postharvest fumigation in cold storage and irradiation, but these alternatives have not yet been scaled up to widespread use. We are faced with using our existing arsenal of fumigants for the near future and hoping to buy enough time to develop alternatives. What have we been doing for the last decade during mounting evidence that EDB would become a controversial product?

These and other policy questions underlie the current crisis and argue for a broader approach being taken in this area of regulation. I for one will continue to push for a longer term emphasis in this area. It is best for the public, the industry, and the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues will go through the material which I am proposing to insert in the RECORD at this point. I do ask, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent to insert, following my remarks, the EPA's statement of last Friday concerning the action that they are taking, together with the background sheet which they have submitted with their statement; an article in the February 3 issue of Science with regard to the EDB, and then in addition to that I would like unanimous consent to include a paper prepared by the General Accounting Office as a report to me labeled "Issues Surrounding the Pesticide Ethylene Dibromide." This paper was prepared at my request I think nearly 2 years ago in connection with the Medfly outbreak in California. But, aside from the fact that it is 2 years old, it still gives an excellent picture of the background of the situation.

In addition to that, I would like unanimous consent to include a paper prepared by the Congressional Research Service labeled "Ethylene dibromide," which is an update as of last week, January 31, giving the background from the standpoint of the Congressional Research Service.

All of these documents are valuable additions to our background information. I have only submitted a portion of the information that was available, partly out of a desire not to load up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD too much, but also perhaps to encourage some of the more concerned Members to explore some of the other reports that have been made.

□ 1340

There are not only many other reports, but there are some cases where reports were authorized but not made. It would be interesting to explore those. For example, the Executive Office of the President set up a task force on this 2 years ago to explore the issue and to make recommendations for coordinating the total Federal approach to this matter and I suspect they found it was too difficult a problem because the task force never made a report.

I would very much like to understand why it is that they failed to come to grips with this problem and take action at a much earlier date.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KILDEE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN)?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The material referred to follows:

EPA ENVIRONMENTAL NEWS

U.S. Environmental Protection Agency Administrator William D. Ruckelshaus today announced the immediate emergency suspension of the pesticide ethylene dibromide (EDB) for use as a grain fumigant and recommended residue levels for grain and grain-related products to protect the nation's food supply from EDB contamination.

The actions Ruckelshaus announced today call for:

Effective immediately, the emergency suspension—the strongest action the agency can take under the law—of the use of EDB as a fumigant for stored grain and grain milling machinery, halting at once all further sales and uses of the chemical;

The establishment of recommended maximum acceptable residue levels for raw grains, milled grain products and finished ready-to-eat products;

Initiation of a rulemaking process to revoke the exemption that currently prevents the agency from setting tolerance levels enforceable by the Food and Drug Administration.

Concerning the use of EDB as a fumigant on citrus fruit, Ruckelshaus said, "We received data four days ago that show levels higher than we expected in some imported citrus. Just as I need more time to collect and analyze grain samples and data, I need more time now to do the same for fruit." He added that in "just a few weeks I will announce my decision as to how we will address that use."

Ruckelshaus noted, "Today's action—coupled with our emergency suspension of EDB's use as a soil fumigant this past September—will eliminate about 97 percent of the chemical's agricultural use."

He said the emergency suspension of EDB as a grain fumigant will result in the "clearing of EDB from the food pipeline in this country. I firmly believe that the guidelines we are recommending today are fully protective of public health. I expect the residue levels on all grain products will begin to decline almost immediately as a result of the actions we are announcing today. In fact, in the very near future, that rate of decline should become quite pronounced."

Ruckelshaus said he was recommending the following maximum permissible residue levels for EDB on grain and grain-related products:

For raw grain intended for human consumption—wheat, corn, oats, etc.—the level should not exceed 900 parts per billion;

For intermediate level products such as flour, various mixes for preparing baked goods, soft cereals, and other products that require cooking before eating, the recommended residue level is 150 parts per billion;

For ready-to-eat products such as cold cereals, snack foods, bread, and all baked goods, the residue levels should not exceed 30 parts per billion.

"Many of the data upon which these guidelines were built were provided to us by a number of states," Ruckelshaus said. "I hope now that our three recommended levels will help those and other states effect a consistent, coherent approach to what is clearly a national problem." Additional data was provided by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the Food and Drug Administration, the Grocery Manufacturers Association and other industry groups.

On Sept. 30, 1983, EPA announced the suspension of the use of EDB as a soil fumigant for agricultural crops, which accounted for an estimated 90 percent of its pesticide uses in controlling nematodes (root worms). At the same time, the agency ordered cancellation of its uses as a fumigant for stored grain and on grain milling machinery. Nine parties appealed the cancellation of grain uses and asked for a hearing before an Administrative Law Judge. By statute, the products subject to that hearing can continue to be used until the hearing is concluded and a final order is issued—typically a two-year process.

In its Sept. 30 order, the agency also called for cancellation by Sept. 1 of this year of EDB's uses as a quarantine fumigant on citrus fruits, tropical fruits such as mangoes and papayas and other fruits and vegetables which can be host to tropical fruit flies.

Ruckelshaus said most of the remaining three percent of EDB is used as a quarantine fumigant on fresh citrus and other tropical fruits. However, he added that the majority of fresh citrus grown in this country is not treated with EDB. Generally less than two percent of the total fresh citrus consumed in the U.S. is treated with EDB, most of it imported.

The six states which have fumigation requirements to control fruit fly infestation are Florida, California, New Mexico, Texas, Arizona, and Hawaii.

EDB, a persistent halogenated hydrocarbon, has been registered as a pesticide since 1948. At the time of last year's suspension order, over 280 million pounds (140,000 tons) of EDB were being produced annually in this country. Of this, some 20 million pounds were used as a pesticide, and the remainder as an additive in leaded gasoline. Exposure to EDB from its use in gasoline, however, is minimal compared to that from its use as a grain fumigant, because virtually all of the EDB in gasoline is destroyed in the combustion process.

Studies in laboratory animals have indicated EDB to be a carcinogen and mutagen that can cause reproductive disorders.

EPA EDB FACTS

BACKGROUND

Ethylene dibromide (EDB) has been registered as a pesticide since 1948. It is a halogenated hydrocarbon, as are DDT, chlordane, heptachlor, aldrin, dieldrin and dibromochloropropane (DBCP), which were subject to EPA regulatory decisions in the 1970's.

Over 280 million pounds of EDB are produced annually in the United States. About 260 million pounds (over 90 percent of the annual total) are used as an additive in leaded gasoline. The remaining eight percent, which exceeds 20 million pounds annually, has been used as a pesticide for various agricultural activities.

Until suspended by EPA in September 1983, the major agricultural use of EDB (involving almost 20 million pounds per year) was for pre-plant soil fumigation. EDB was injected into the soil to protect a crop from attack by nematodes (root worms). Citrus, pineapples, soybeans, cotton, tobacco, and over 30 other fruit, vegetable and nut crops were protected this way.

EDB is employed in quarantine programs to fumigate citrus and other fruits and vegetables after harvest to prevent the spread of tropical fruit flies. It is also used to fumigate stored grain and milling machinery. This prevents insect infestation. Somewhat less than one million pounds of EDB have been used annually for these purposes.

Minor uses of EDB include termite control, and fumigation of storage vaults, beehives, and timber. These involve less than 300,000 pounds annually.

In 1975, the National Cancer Institute issued a preliminary notice that EDB appeared to induce cancer in laboratory animals. In 1977, further evidence confirmed that EDB posed risks of producing tumors, genetic mutations and adverse reproductive effects. In December 1977, EPA began a review of the risks and benefits of EDB under a procedure known as Rebuttable Presumption Against Registration (RPAR). The Agency issued Position Document I (PD 1) which described the health risks of concern, and solicited comments and further information from registrants, users, and the public concerning risks and benefits of EDB.

After analyzing the comments and information received in response to PD 1, and further research on the use of EDB, EPA issued a proposed decision to cancel EDB in December 1980. This included registrations for fumigation of stored grain, milling machinery and timber, and to phase out the use of quarantine fumigation over approximately two years. The soil fumigation was to be retained, as that use did not appear to result in significant human exposure.

During this review the agency found evidence that EDB residues can occur in food products as a result of grain and milling machinery fumigation. The actual extent to which this occurred was not known. Not all grain is fumigated, and there are other fumigants besides EDB. The agency also recognized that the chemical properties of EDB indicated that it has the potential for contaminating groundwater, although there was no information at that time that such contamination had occurred. EPA arranged with the State of California to conduct ground water monitoring to detect possible EDB contamination.

The proposed decision in 1980 contained many proposals for reducing risks to persons who apply EDB and handle treated commodities, because the available evidence indicated these people were exposed to EDB to a much higher degree than the general public. The 1980 proposal was reviewed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the independent Scientific Advisory Panel, as the law requires. Many comments also were received from registrants, user groups and the public. Following the proposed decision, a number of Federal and State agencies conducted further studies on ways to apply EDB and handle treated commodities in order to reduce exposure for applicators and other workers.

In March 1982, EPA was notified that residues of EDB had been detected in groundwater in Georgia. EPA investigated the situation there in cooperation with the U.S. Geological Survey. Since EDB is also used in gasoline, it could not be readily determined whether the groundwater contamination resulted from the soil fumigation use or leaking underground storage tanks. However, in June 1983, California monitoring found EDB contaminated groundwater in areas of soil fumigation use. The use of EDB was halted in four counties. Shortly thereafter, wells in Hawaii and Florida also were found to be contaminated.

The discovery of contaminated groundwater significantly changed the risk/benefit perspective for EPA, as this was a new route of dietary exposure to the public. As a result, on September 30, 1983, EPA ordered an immediate suspension of the soil fumigation use of EDB. This is the most stringent measure EPA can take under the law; it immediately halted the sale and distribution of EDB registered for soil fumigation. Though appeals to EPA's suspension action can be made, use of the product ceases during this appeal process. Soil fumigation accounted for over 92 percent of the more than 20 million pounds of EDB used annually as an agricultural pesticide.

The September 30 decision proposed immediate cancellation of EDB fumigation of stored grain, grain milling machinery, felled logs, and proposed cancellation of quarantine use on citrus and other tropical fruits to control the fruit fly effective September 1984. Appeals were made for administrative hearings for each use EPA proposed to cancel.

Minor uses of EDB—including beehives supers, storage vaults and termite controls—are being retained with added safety precautions and the requirement that applicators be trained and certified.

The use of EDB in gasoline has not been a part of EPA's action. Preliminary analysis of exposure to EDB from gasoline vapors suggest that exposures pose no public health hazard.

EDB Contamination Kindles Federal Action

Florida's recent action in banning the sale of more than 70 grain products contaminated with the pesticide ethylene dibromide (EDB) has brought to the boil an issue that has been simmering on the back burners of federal regulatory agencies for 7 years. The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) first moved to control uses of EDB in 1977, but protests from manufacturers and users and lack of attention during the first 2½ years of the Reagan Administration have so far thwarted federal action.

Florida decided to take matters into its own hands and pulled off grocer's shelves a variety of nationally marketed grain products under brand names such as Betty Crocker, Aunt Jemima, and Pillsbury. Other states have since found EDB-tainted products in their territories, which has sent EPA scrambling to determine what levels of the pesticide should be permitted in food. Farmers and food manufacturers, fearing that the agency could declare a large portion of the nation's grain supply inedible, have called on Secretary of Agriculture John Block to press their case with EPA administrator William Ruckelshaus.

EDB is a popular pesticide because it is effective and versatile. For the past 40 years, farmers have applied EDB to control insect infestation in stored grain. For 20 years, many grain companies have fumigated milling machinery with the chemical. More recently, use of the pesticide has broadened. Farmers in the Southeast and Southwest have injected EDB into soil to kill nematodes before planting crops. During the 1981 medfly crisis, California fumigated fruit grown in-state with EDB and subsequently required imported fruit—primarily that shipped from Florida and Texas—to undergo EDB fumigation. Florida and other states also fumigate citrus fruit shipped to Japan.

State and federal officials now realize that EDB's extensive use has led to a widespread problem. A significant portion of the country's processed grain products may have some contamination, according to EPA's expert on the pesticide, Richard Johnson. So far, he says, 30 percent of the packaged grain products tested by various sources show contamination. (Preliminary studies by Florida indicate that cooking may dissipate about 80 percent of the pesticide, but more experiments are being conducted.)

Last summer California, Florida, Hawaii, and Georgia discovered that ground water in various areas was polluted with EDB from soil fumigation. Most recently, California announced that Florida citrus shipped to the state had worrisome EDB concentrations in the pulp.

The danger to humans from low-level, long-term exposure is not yet clear because no reliable epidemiological studies are available. But according to EPA documents, animal studies demonstrate that EDB is highly toxic. Experiments show that the chemical causes cancer, gene mutations, and reproductive damage in a variety of animal species. Studies by federal agencies in the 1970's indicated that the pesticide is carcinogenic in rats and mice at 20,000 parts per billion (ppb). If EDB were a new chemical, it would never pass muster with current environmental law, according to several federal environmental officials.

Given the animal data and the recent reports of contamination in water and food, EPA officials are now trying to decide whether the agency should issue stricter regulations by declaring an immediate end to all uses of the pesticide. In September, it banned the sale and distribution of EDB as a soil fumigant and said it wants a phaseout of other uses over the next year. The phaseout, however has been appealed by members of the agricultural community, the chemical industry, and the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA). This could delay full cancellation of all EDB use until 1986. EPA's task is also complicated by the fact that the Reagan Administration's Caribbean Basin initiative promotes the importation of tropical fruit from Caribbean countries. USDA import regulations cannot be met without use of the pesticide. The U.S. Agency for International Development, at the urging of USDA, is currently deciding whether it too should appeal EPA's action.

EPA officials are also working feverishly to determine what concentration of the pesticide should be allowed in food because currently there is no federal tolerance standard for EDB. Florida officials, without waiting for federal guidance, concluded that 1 ppb is unacceptable. The 76 products that were banned contained an average range of 15 to 20 ppb of the pesticide, but one food sample went as high as 755 ppb. The Grocery Manufacturers of America, a national trade group, is fighting the ban tooth and nail but so far has been unsuccessful in obtaining a federal injunction. EPA is expected to announce a standard within the next month.

Regulatory action on EDB has been impeded by two factors. When EPA suspects that a pesticide poses an unacceptable health hazard, federal law requires it to develop regulatory proposals by weighing the risks and benefits and then seeking public comment. In the case of EDB, industry objected at every step of the way. And under former EPA administrator Anne Burford further progress came to a virtual halt.

After EPA gave notice in 1977 that it intended to regulate the pesticide on the basis of the animal data, the process from start to regulatory finish was to last 43 weeks. The procedure bogged down immediately. Industry inundated the agency with documents disputing the findings. It also insisted that there were no good alternatives to replace the pesticide. Three years later, EPA had completed only the first step of the review.

In December 1980, just before the Carter Administration exited, the agency issued a comprehensive report that rejected almost all the criticisms raised by the chemical companies and the agricultural community and went on to propose greater restrictions on EDB's use. The report, written by Johnson, proposed severe limits on EDB's use as a soil fumigant. At that point, EPA did not call for an outright ban because it lacked firm evidence of ground water pollution. It also recommended a gradual elimination of EDB as a fumigant of stored grain, milling machinery, and citrus fruit, arguing that the potential economic losses would be negligible to farmers and others. It proposed a phaseout in 3 years to allow the food industry sufficient time to develop alternatives to the pesticide. In the long run, EPA contended, the health risks far outweighed the financial considerations. The agency came to this conclusion after it uncovered some startling findings.

For decades, it was generally assumed that the pesticide was volatile and left no residue in food. In the late 1970's, however, a number of researchers discovered that the pesticide does not dissipate. One study showed that EDB persisted in wheat with levels reaching 500 ppb 3 months after fumigation. EPA's own scientists confirmed the problem of contamination. From a USDA laboratory, EPA officials obtained batches of wheat flour that had been distributed across the country as part of federal food subsidies, including the School Lunch Program. EPA scientists reported in 1980 that all the samples contained the pesticide. (Later analyses in 1981 revealed that some of these wheat samples contained up to 4200 ppb. The samples were then made into biscuits, which registered levels averaging about 37 ppb.) Armed with the 1980 information and results from several other studies on EDB residue in grain and citrus fruit, the agency calculated that exposure to the pesticide in an average diet could increase a person's risk of cancer by a factor of 3 in 10,000. In the past, an increased cancer risk of even 1 in 1,000,000 triggered regulatory action.

The agency's recommendations were coldly received by the new Reagan appointees. Block wrote EPA, prior to Burford's arrival, that the proposed cancellation was unacceptable because alternatives could not be developed by the 3-year deadline even though EPA had concluded the industry could substitute other pest control methods for the pesticide. He said the proposal would also place financial burdens on the food industry. He did not acknowledge EPA's concern about the health risks of the pesticide through dietary exposure, except to state that he wanted more data to determine residues in food.

The pesticide issue was also stymied at EPA by John Todhunter, then head of the Office of Pesticides and Toxic Substances, who resigned in the wake of Burford's controversial departure. A hearing held in September by Representative Mike Synar (D-Okla.), chairman of a subcommittee of the Government Operations Committee, revealed that Todhunter had demanded numerous revisions of the agency's EDB report. Synar also presented documents indicating that Todhunter and associates held private meetings with members of Florida's citrus growers and vegetable industry. Todhunter at the hearing denied he attended some of the meetings; another, he insisted, had no influence on the agency's decisionmaking. According to recent interviews with EPA officials, Todhunter also gutted the agency division in charge of handling these types of special pesticide reviews. Although the agency had some 90 pesticides on a roster for reexamination, Todhunter slashed the staff from 128 to about 20.

Time trickled away until last summer when California reported ground water contamination. The discovery was "the straw that broke the camel's back," said Johnson, who is still head of the agency's EDB team. After a 3-year hiatus, the agency set to work on a new set of regulations. In 2 weeks, Johnson and colleagues produced another lengthy report and pushed even harsher rules. Based on additional information, EPA calculated that the cancer risk was an order of magnitude higher than its 1980 estimates.

Again, the citrus industry, farmers, and chemical companies objected and have formally appealed EPA's action on the grounds that there are no good alternatives to the pesticide. USDA, which recently held private meetings with industry, has also intervened. Settling the differences could take another 2 years, but the revelation of EDB-tainted food and heightened public awareness may speed up the process.

EPA has said that several methods show promise as a substitute for EDB fumigation, but they have all been pooh-poohed by the agriculture department. According to EPA, citrus fruit could be treated by irradiation or another procedure that subjects fruit to cold temperatures; for stored grain, other chemicals could be applied. Florida citrus growers protest that without EDB, they will lose the $25-million grapefruit market in Japan. The Japanese goverment, however, has accepted citrus fruit treated by the cold storage method "for a long time," says Hisao Azuma, an agriculture official at the Japanese embassy in Washington.

Despite EPA's desire to regulate the pesticide since 1977, efforts at USDA to help farmers and citrus growers develop other methods have been meager, according to a recent study on EDB by the General Accounting Office. In a briefing submitted last spring to Representative George Brown, Jr. (D-Calif.), chairman of the Agriculture Committee's subcommittee on research, the General Accounting Office said studies by USDA have "been limited to short-term research projects. . . . This crisis-oriented research resulted in the postponement of broader-scoped, long-term research." It noted that since 1977, it has twice advised USDA to develop an agency-wide plan for research and development, but to no avail. An EPA official recently put it this way, "Without an all-out cancellation, industry wouldn't consider alternatives. Now we're canceling and they're screaming there are no alternatives."

The General Accounting Office also faulted EPA's regulatory process. It cited several problems, concluding that the agency has "emphasized starting, but not completing the process, planned poorly, [and] not resolved several important policy and procedural issues. . . ."

One interesting fact in EDB's regulatory history is that the House Agriculture Committee, which has jurisdiction over pesticide use, has yet to examine the problems with the pesticide and EPA's role. Despite the strong criticisms by the General Accounting Office, Brown did not pursue the matter with his usual keen interest in pesticide problems. Some sources allege that other committee members told Brown to lay off EFB because of its wide importance to their constituents, but Brown denies this. Nevertheless, Synar and other legislators are going after the topic. Senator Dave Durenberger (R-Minn.), chairman of the oversight subcommittee of the Environment and Public Works Committee, will hold an EDB hearing on 27 January.

EPA is now pondering what to do next. On the issue of citrus fumigation, Edwin Johnson, head of EPA's Office of Pesticide Programs, says that the agency may choose a tolerance standard "at the lowest level we can set and still fumigate effectively." With grain products, Richard Johnson believes that Florida's cut-off point of 1 ppb is probably too harsh. Although he had hoped that EDB's use as a grain and citrus fumigant would have ended last summer, Johnson says 1 ppb standard would be too disruptive to the nation's economy and its food supply. "We are not dealing with a crisis [to health]," he said. Noting that the agency has already taken 7 years to achieve any substantive regulation of EDB, "Another year is not going to make that much difference." Meanwhile, the special review process at EPA has not been overhauled, its staff has not been reconstituted, and the list of pesticides slated for reevaluation continues to grow.

GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE REPORT TO CONGRESSMAN GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

ISSUES SURROUNDING THE PESTICIDE ETHYLENE DIBROMIDE

At the request of George E. Brown, Jr., Chairman of the Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture, House Committee on Agriculture, we reviewed efforts to eradicate the Mediterranean fruit fly (Medfly) from California and control the gypsy moth in the northeastern part of the Nation. As agreed with the subcommittee's office, this briefing paper presents the results of our review of the controversial pesticide, ethylene dibromide (EDB), which was used in the Medfly program.

Scope of work

During our review of EDB issues, we contacted officials at the Department of Agriculture's (USDA's) Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service (APHIS), Agricultural Research Service (ARS), and Office of Inspector General; the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) headquarters and region IX (San Francisco); the Department of Health and Human Service's Food and Drug Administration (FDA); the Department of Labor's Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA); and California's Department of Food and Agriculture (CDFA), Division of Occupational Safety and Health (Cal/OSHA), Department of Finance, and Controller's Office. We discussed alternatives to using pesticides as postharvest fumigants with two California firms (Emergent Technologies, Inc. and International Nutronics, Inc.) and the CDFA medical consultant. We were referred to these two firms by APHIS and CDFA officials.

We relief on agency summary or management reports and did not examine the detailed supporting documentation. For example, we relied on monthly summaries of pesticide usage and did not examine the daily use reports. Besides the relevant reports and documents of the agencies listed above, we also reviewed reports and comments from the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (NIOSH), National Cancer Institute, EPA's Scientific Advisory Panel, Office of Technology Assessment, labor unions, and private companies.

Background

Over the past 30 years, the U.S. agricultural sector has become more and more dependent on chemical pesticides to control crop damage. Even though other pest control methods (such as the use of predators and parasites) are available, pesticides remain our major weapon against pests. Pesticides control insects, diseases, rodents, weeds, bacteria, and other pests that attack food and fiber supplies and threaten our health and welfare.

Although pesticides benefit agricultural production, they are a mixed blessing. If used improperly or without knowledge of their side effects, pesticides, like other chemicals, can poison, cause cancer and birth defects, and harm wildlife and the environment.[1] In addition, concern has been expressed about the adverse effect of pesticides on beneficial predators and parasites and other nontarget organisms and the development of pesticide-resistant pests.

Government decisionmakers, producers, and the public must therefore face the complex problem of determining a balance between the damage pests do versus the environmental, health, and other adverse problems caused by pesticides. This complex problem is exemplified by the issues surrounding the use of EDB.

Using the pesticide EDB to fumigate produce, especially fruit, as part of the Medfly eradication program in California illustrates the problems surrounding the Nation's pest control efforts and decisions. Although EDB has been used as a fumigant for about 30 years, the recent medfly crisis underscores the fact that EDB-related problems and unanswered questions remain.

Numerous Federal and State agencies are involved in EDB issues

Responsibility for various aspects of EDB fumigation is vested in numerous Federal and State agencies. Federal agencies with significant involvement in the EDB issues are APHIS, EPA, OSHA, NIOSH, FDA, and ARS. California's Department of Food and Agriculture and Division of Occupational Safety and Health are also involved. The following table summarizes the various governmental agencies and their respective areas of responsibility and involvement in the EDB issue.

SUMMARY OF AGENCIES' INVOLVEMENT IN THE EDB ISSUE

Agency and involvement

USDA's Animal and Plant Health Inspection service: APHIS is responsible for imposing quarantines to protect the country from the introduction or spread of pests. It required using EDB to prevent the spread of California's Medfly infestation.

USDA's Agricultural Research Service: ARS provides research data to APHIS on (1) EDB residue levels in treated commodities and (2) alternatives to EDB.

Environmental Protection Agency: EPA is the primary regulator of pesticides. Since 1977 it has been conducting a rebuttable presumption against registration (RPAR) program on EDB.

Department of Labor's Occupational Safety and Health Administration: OSHA is the primary regulator for safety in the workplace. Currently, it is considering revising its EDB worker exposure level standard.

Department of Health and Human Service's National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health: NIOSH reviews, evaluates, and disseminates information on occupational hazards. It issued several reports on the hazards of EDB.

Department of Health and Human Service's Food and Drug Administration: Irradiation, a promising alternative to EDB fumigation of citrus, is regulated by FDA. FDA conditionally approved pilot irradition programs for citrus in California.

California's Department of Food and Agriculture: CDFA is responsible for issues, including pesticide use, which affect the State's food and agricultural complex. With APHIS, it has overall responsibility for the eradication of the Medfly in California.

Califonria's Division of Occupational Safety and Health: Cal/OSHA is responsible for protecting California workers. In 1981, it imposed an occupational exposure standard more stringent than the Federal OSHA standard.

The EDB problem

Recent scientific evidence derived from animal studies indicates that EDB presents potential health risks, including cancer and reproductive disorders. The problem with EDB's use as a postharvest fumigant of citrus centers around (1) the absence of a feasible alternative and (2) inadequate or inappropriate regulatory standards.

EPA has determined that EDB's risk to human health is greater than its social, economic and environmental benefits. However, EDB is still being used throughout the Nation to fumigate citrus, not only for Medflies but also for Caribbean and Mexican fruit flies. EPA, APHIS, ARS, and OSHA officials all acknowledge that EDB is a highly toxic pesticide and potential carcinogen. They add, however, that currently there is no feasible alternative to EDB in citrus fumigation. Vapor heat and cold storage can control Medflies as effectively as EDB, but these methods often result in fruit damage.

The 1980 outbreak of the Medfly in California required quick and effective action to head off a potential agricultural catastrophe. To prevent the spread of the infestation, APHIS imposed a quarantine which require that selected Medfly host produce (produce attracting Medflies), including citrus, moving out of regulated areas be treated with EDB. Japan, a major importer of U.S. citrus, also imposed import restrictions which required using EDB as a fumigant.

Another aspect of the EDB problem involves the regulatory standards. EPA's standard sets a limit on the EDB (actually EDB's resultant inorganic bromide) residue left in or on the fumigated product. OSHA's standard provides a permissible level for worker exposure to EDB in the air.

EPA and OSHA officials acknowledged that scientific data strongly indicates that the present EDB air standard is inadequate. In addition, the EDB tolerance standard for citrus may be inappropriate, because it set a limit on EDB's inorganic bromide but not on EDB per se (see p. 13). Occupational and public health concerns surrounding using EDB as a fumigant for citrus increased during the Medfly's occurrence in California. For example:

EDB fumigation of U.S. citrus for export to Japan touched off a controversy among government agencies, environmental groups, and labor unions in both countries over the safety of EDB.

In September and October 1981, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and other labor unions petitioned OSHA for an emergency temporary standard which would reduce the present permissible exposure level.

On September 2, 1981, Cal/OSHA adopted an emergency temporary standard for EDB. This standard was made permanent on March 21, 1982. The California standard is nearly two orders of magnitude lower (1/100) than the current Federal standard.

APHIS had no feasible alternative to EDB

To prevent the spread of the Medfly in 1980 and 1981, APHIS quarantined the State of California and established regulated areas within the State. This quarantine required that, before leaving regulated areas, suspected Medfly host citrus must be treated in some manner to kill any "hitchhiking" Medflies.

ARS told APHIS that the two most viable treatment methods for citrus were (1) chemical fumigation with EDB and (2) cold storage of the fruit for 10 to 16 days at near-freezing temperatures. ARS cautioned, however, that the cold storage method often damaged the fruit. The vapor heat alternative was not considered for the California Medfly infestation because of it's high energy demands, length of treatment, and impracticality of handling large volumes of fruit.

APHIS checked with EPA and found that EDB was still a registered pesticide. (APHIS officials were aware that EPA was considering banning EDB as a postharvest fumigant.) EPA told APHIS that no chemical alternatives to EDB were registered for citrus fumigation purposes. APHIS also checked with FDA on the status of irradiation, a potential alternative to EDB fumigation, but FDA had not approved its use for postharvest fumigation of agricultural products.

Therefore, APHIS officials stated that, in establishing quarantine regulations, they had no choice but to approve EDB's use on citrus. The regulations also allowed using the cold storage treatment on citrus. However, APHIS officials realized this method would rarely be used because of (1) the damage it might do to the produce and (2) the lack of proper facilities to store the produce at the required temperatures.

Lack of progress in discovering and implementing an alternative to EDB

Because of the absence of a feasible alternative, in 1980 EPA proposed a phaseout by 1983, instead of an immediate ban, on EDB's use as a fruit and vegetable fumigant. The duration of EPA's phaseout period was based on estimates of when irradiation would be operational on a broad scale. Recent estimates were received from USDA, FDA and EPA officials ranged between 1985 and 1992.

[1] See GAO report, "Delays and Unresolved Issues Plague New Pesticide Protection Programs" (CED-80-32, Feb. 15, 1980).

The Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (FFDCA) of 1938 (21 U.S.C. 301 et seq.), as amended, makes FDA responsible for regulating the safety of food additives. The act specifically included sources of radiation (irradiation) in the definitions of food additive (section 201(s)) and adulterated food (section 402(a)(7)). Since irradiation is considered a food additive, FDA is the Federal agency responsible for approving its use on raw agricultural commodities.

ARS is USDA's principal in-house research arm. As stated in its current draft strategic plan, ARS' mission is to "plan, develop, implement, and evaluate research designed to produce the new knowledge and technologies required to assure the continuing vitality of the Nation's food and agricultural enterprise." This mission includes ARS' responsibility to provide the basic, or background, research for EDB alternatives. Developing and implementing that research is the responsibility of APHIS' Methods Development Staff and private industry.

USDA research efforts

Information has been available to USDA since 1975 that the pesticide EDB is a suspected carcinogen and since 1977 that EPA was considering canceling its use.

Since 1976 USDA estimated it spent over $4 million researching alternatives (including irradiation) to EDB, however, an approved replacement has not been found. USDA officials said that this research was not a high priority item until 1980 when the Medfly outbreak occurred in California and EPA published a preliminary decision to cancel EDB.

Furthermore, an ARS National Research Program Leader told us that much of the postharvest commodity treatment research (which includes EDB-related research) has been limited to short-term research projects to provide quick information on narrowly scoped problems. This crisis-oriented research resulted in the postponement of broader scoped, long-term research. He also said that the past lack of a long-range research plan was partly responsible for the present absence of a feasible alternative to EDB.

The lack of a long-range research plan has been pointed out on a number of occasions. In a December 1981 report,[2] the Office of Technology Assessment stated that a satisfactory long-term process does not exist for evaluating agricultural research activities and developing research priorities. It also stated that decisions are made on an ad hoc basis with little coordination among USDA and other agencies conducting agricultural research. Furthermore, in our July 24, 1981, report,[3] we found that USDA, as the primary Federal agricultural researcher, did not have a long-range plan for in-house research. We recommended, as we had in 1977, that the Secretary of Agriculture develop an agencywide plan for in-house agricultural research and development. An Assistant to the Administrator of ARS acknowledged that past planning efforts had deficiencies and said that they were drafting a strategic plan to correct the situation.

USDA officials point out that their research has been somewhat successful in that prospective alternatives have been identified. As mentioned above, irradiation is considered a very promising alternative to EDB fumingation of citrus. But USDA officials believe still more research is needed regarding irradiation's effect on fruit quality. USDA officials also told us that recent breakthroughs regarding the cold treatment method may make it a more viable short-term alternative to EDB, while irradiation still might be the long-term alternative.

Quarantine Treatment Criterion

Our discussions with ARS and APHIS officials, indicated that a great deal of concern and confusion exists over APHIS' criterion for approving quarantine treatment methods. Basically, APHIS' criterion is that research must demonstrate that a particular treatment method kills 99.99683 percent (this precent is referred to as the probit 9.0 level) of the target pest. APHIS officials told us that the methodologies for demonstrating the probit 9.0 level are not clearly understood by ARS scientists or other research institutions. APHIS officials also told us that the criterion has not been formally communicated in writing to ARS and that not much literature is available on probits. An APHIS staff scientist acknowledged that this could cause problems in designing experiments to demonstrate attainment of the probit 9.0 level.

ARS officials told us they have three concerns with APHIS' quarantine treatment criterion:

APHIS' criterion for approving treatment methods is too rigid in that it is applied to all possible host commodities. Demonstrating this high kill ratio, 99.99683 percent, is unnecessary for hosts which are not likely to be infested.

It is very costly to demonstrate probit 9.0 because APHIS requires an unnecessarily high pest population in the experiments.

The criterion does not allow for sterilizing pests as a substitute for killing them.

Regarding this last concern, an ARS official told us that sterilizing the pest produces the same desired quarantine effect—ensuring that a pest does not spread outside an already infested area—as killing the pest. If a pest should survive a particular disinfestation treatment, such as irradiation, yet be sterilized so that it is incapable of producing offspring, that pest will not spread or perpetuate an infestation.

This issue of sterilization versus killing a pest as part of the approval criterion is crucial to the viability and research of the irradiation alternative to EDB. The ARS official told us that if APHIS would accept sterilization as part of its criterion, irradiation would be a more promising alternative to EDB. Less irradiation is needed to sterilize a fruit fly than to kill it. The lower the irradiation dose, the less likelihood of fruit damage, and therefore, the more economically viable the treatment is to producers and shippers.

The ARS official said that APHIS officials have orally indicated that data demonstrating sterilization will be acceptable in meeting the approval criterion. However, ARS' current research is designed to demonstrate just the killing effect of irradiation. ARS officials said they would redesign experiments to demonstrate the sterilizing effect if and when they are assured in writing that APHIS will accept the data as meeting the probit 9.0 criterion.

FDA Actions Regarding Irradiation

FDA has recently begun to take action on approving the use of irradiation as an alternative to EDB. Until 1981, FDA assigned food irradiation a low priority. An FDA official said that FDA has not acted on the irradiation process over the past 20 years because private industry did not pursue it.

Although FDA has permitted irradiation's use to inhibit sprouts on potatoes and rid wheat and wheat flour of insects since the early 1960's, it has not approved a 1973 petition from USDA for irradiating papayas. In an August 28, 1981, memorandum to a senior policy advisor to the President, FDA stated that it has not approved any further use of irradiation "because of difficulties encountered in the process of establishing safety for the food additive use of irradiation." A major problem with the safety evaluation was the lack of knowledge of the identity, amount, and toxicity of the by-products formed in irradiated food. Traditional toxicity testing, which uses the results of animal feeding studies to determine a "safety factor," was not practical because it is difficult to feed animals the exaggerated amounts of irradiated food that such studies require.

On March 27, 1981, FDA published an advance notice of proposed rulemaking on food irradiation. Among other things, FDA is considering a proposal to permit food irradiation at a dosage not exceeding 100 krad (a krad is a unit of energy expressed as a radiation absorbed dose).

FDA stated that irradiating food at doses not exceeding 100 krad poses no danger to consumers. However, it believes there is insufficient information to demonstrate that irradiating fruits and vegetables at particular dosages (1) is effective in controlling insect infestation and (2) does not affect marketability or quality. FDA also emphasized that consumer fear of anything treated with irradiation could affect the economic viability of the irradiation alternative.

Although FDA does not expect to issue a final regulation regarding irradiation of foods until 1984, in September and November 1981, it granted conditional approval for two California firms to irradiate commercial produce. FDA, USDA, and EPA officials hope that these test projects will answer many of their questions about food irradiation.

Lack of coordination between FDA and USDA

Officials from both FDA and USDA told us that prior to 1980 coordination problems between the two agencies contributed to the slow progress toward approval of the irradiation alternative. They said, however, that since 1980 coordination has improved.

As mentioned above, in 1973, over 8 years ago, USDA petitioned FDA for approval to use irradiation to disinfest papayas. To support the petition, USDA submitted a voluminous amount of data regarding irradiation and it effects, or lack thereof, on produce and lab animals. FDA officials repeatedly asked for more and different kinds of data. USDA officials told us that they could not get a commitment from FDA as to the specific type of research data needed to resolve FDA's concerns. USDA officials estimated they spent about $1.5 million in developing data for this petition. FDA never acted on USDA's petition.

FDA officials said that during that time they had difficulty in determining whether irradiated foods were safe. Normal toxicity testing, which is used for most other food additives, did not lend itself to testing irradiated foods. In 1979, FDA set up an internal task force to evaluate the agency's policy on irradiated foods and to recommend safety criteria. In August 1980, the task force recommended that food irradiated at doses of (1) 100 krad or less be considered wholesome and safe for consumption and (2) more than 100 krad be subject to a battery of toxicological tests and animal feeding studies.

The March 1981 FDA advance notice of proposed rulemaking included the task force's recommendations. FDA officials told us that their final regulations on irradiated foods would clarify specifically what data FDA needs to approve a particular irradiation process, including irradiation of citrus. This final regulation, however, is not expected to be published for another 2 years.

Officials told us that two of their major concerns about irradiation are its (1) effectiveness at killing the pest and (2) effect on the marketability of the produce. In the August 28, 1981, memorandum to a senior policy advisor to the President, FDA acknowledged that these two concerns are likewise USDA's responsibility:

"Although we are considering allowing the irradiation of produce on a limited basis to address and answer concerns on efficiency and post-irradiation effects, we now have insufficient information on which to issue a regulation under section 409 of the Act [FFDCA], to provide for such use. Despite this statutory dilemma, we believe, * * * food irradiated below 100 krad to be safe." However, we suggest that the U.S. Department of Agriculture be asked to comment on the need for research to establish the marketability of irradiated produce and the extent to which the irradiation method chosen satisfies USDA's quarantine requirements."

EDB regulation

EDB's use in California is regulated by EPA, OSHA, and Cal/OSHA. EPA has set a standard for the maximum level of EDB (actually, EDB's resultant inorganic bromide) residue left in or on the fumigated product. The Federal OSHA standard provides a permissible level for employee exposure to EDB in the air. Cal/OSHA determined that the Federal OSHA standard was not adequate to protect workers and imposed a more stringent EDB occupational air exposure level.

EPA is the primary regulator of pesticides. Its authority is contained in the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) (7 U.S.C. 136 et seq.), as amended, and FFDCA, as amended. Under FIFRA, a pesticide can generally not be sold, shipped, or delivered unless EPA has registered it. FIFRA further provides that EPA can only unconditionally register a pesticide if it determines, among other things, that the pesticide performs its intended function without causing "any unreasonable risk to man or the environment, taking into account the economic, social, and environmental costs and benefits of the use of any pesticide."

If a pesticide remains in or on food, FFDCA requires that pesticide manufacturers, or other petitioners, apply to EPA for a tolerance—the maximum residue allowed in or on food for that pesticide. EPA sets tolerances on the basis of data the petitioner submits on the nature, level, and toxicity of a pesticide's residues. This data, which includes the results of tests of the pesticide's effect on laboratory animals, is similar to the types of data pesticide manufacturers must submit to EPA to register a pesticide.

Prior to EPA's creation in December 1970, USDA regulated pesticides. Thus, during the 1950's and 1960's, USDA granted the original registrations of EDB. Although EDB remains a registered pesticide, no tolerances have been set for EDB per se in or on agricultural products. Tolerances were set for the inorganic bromides which result from the use of EDB in or on food. EPA can, but has not, set an ambient air standard for EDB.

OSHA has set a maximum standard relating to the exposure of workers to airborne EDB. OSHA's current standard, adopted in 1971, provides that an employee's exposure to airborne EDB shall not exceed an 8-hour, time-weighted average limit of 20 parts of EDB per million parts of air (ppm). The standard was based on a 1970 American National Standards Institute recommendation. The potential for EDB to cause cancer or reproductive damage was not a basis for establishing the current standard because limited EDB-related cancer data was available.

Based on updated reports and studies on the carcinogenicity of EDB—most notably, a 1981 National Cancer Institute study which reported that inhalation of EBD significantly increased the incidence of tumors in rats and mice—Cal/OSHA imposed a much more stringent standard, which provides that no employee be exposed to EDB in excess of a time-weighted average limit of 0.13 ppm.

Federal regulatory actions on the EDB problem

EPA and OSHA now recognize that EDB is a carcinogen and causes reproductive problems in lab animals. Although EPA and OSHA officials acknowledged that scientific data strongly indicates the present EDB air standard is inadequate to protect workers, their actions to revise the standard have been slow. Also, the EDB residue tolerance standard may be inappropriate for protecting consumers. Furthermore, consumers and workers are confused and upset by conflicting EDB standards, and they also may be exposed to unsafe EDB levels.

EPA's RPAR is a slow process

EPA's rebuttable presumption against registration (RPAR) program was designed to quickly and comprehensively weigh the risks and benefits of potentially hazardous pesticides to determine if regulatory action is necessary to protect the public and the environment.

EPA began a general review of EDB shortly after an October 1974 National Cancer Institute "Memorandum of Alert" regarding EDB's suspected carcinogenicity. Today, almost 8 years later, EPA has yet to make a final ruling on EDB. During this time, workers and consumers may have been exposed to unsafe EDB air and residue levels.

In 1978 and 1979, we performed an extensive review of two of EPA's main pesticide protection programs—registration standards and RPAR. In our report [4] on these programs, we stated that EPA needed to complete RPARs faster so that the public is not exposed to dangerous pesticides any longer than necessary. EPA had estimated about 43 weeks between RPAR notice of issuance and the final regulatory decision. Actual performance has not come close to meeting that overly optimistic estimate. We found that RPARs were taking longer to complete than expected because EPA has emphasized starting, but not completing, RPARs; planned poorly; not resolved several important policy and procedural issues; failed to develop formal RPAR operating procedures; relied on an inaccurate status reporting system; and not received timely assistance from its Cancer Assessment Group.

EPA was aware that it needed to accelerate the RPAR process and indicated that several changes were being implemented in response to our report.

EPA officials told us, however, that the above-mentioned management deficiencies only contributed to the slow completion of the RPAR on EDB. EDB is a broad, complex subject; it involves numerous uses besides fumigation of fruits and vegetables (for example, preplanting treatment of soil to protect crops against worms, treatment of felled logs and flour mills, and fumigation of stored grain) and affects numerous sectors of our society, such as farmers, producers, transportation workers, wholesalers, retailers, and consumers. Officials of EPA's Office of Pesticide Programs told us that it takes a long time to properly and adequately consider all risks and social, economic, and environmental benefits associated with EDB's various uses.

Those EPA officials also cited the lack of a viable alternative to EDB for citrus fumigation as a major problem in weighing the risks versus the economic impact of a decision to cancel EDB use. In summarizing EPA's concern for an alternative and its preliminary decision, a 1980 EPA report on EDB stated:

"There is one vital consideration which the Agency has extensively investigated: whether gamma irradiation presents a viable alternative to EDB in the near future. As indicated previously, this method is effective and approved for use in many countries, but has not yet been approved for use in the U.S.

* * * * *

"Based on this factor alone—that irradiation technology can be implemented within about 24 to 36 months—the Agency believes that Option 3 [the phase out of EDB after no more than 2½ years and immediate implementation of specified worker protection measures to ensure that the EDB air standard of 0.4 ppm is met] presents the best solution. * * * Regarding risks to applicators and warehouse workers, the Agency finds that implementation of the safety measures would significantly reduce the risks to these persons without significantly affecting the economic benefits."

As of August 23, 1982, EPA had not concluded the RPAR on EDB. EPA's Special Assistant to the Assistant Administrator for Pesticides told us that the Agency's tentative position still called for the phase out of EDB's use as a citrus fumigant after two to three years, or by mid-1985.

EDB's residue tolerance level may be inappropriate

Presently, no tolerances have been set for EDB per se in or on agricultural products. Tolerances were set for the inorganic bromides which result from EDB's use in or on food. Recent data indicate that this tolerance level may not be appropriate.

EPA has not set a residue tolerance level for EDB per se, because it had been assumed (on the basis of data submitted by petitioners) that no EDB residues would remain on the commodities. This conclusion was based on the hypothesis that the EDB would evaporate or be converted to bromide ions and taken up by the commodities as inorganic bromides. The analytical methods available at that time (from 1950 through 1965) for detecting residues only measured the organic bromide ion. Consequently, the tolerance for the use of EDB on citrus was set at 10 ppm of the inorganic bromide. Since that time, the technology has been developed to detect the organic bromide, or the EDB per se, in treated commodities.

In addition, the risk of cancer to consumers of EDB-treated citrus can be calculated based on certain assumptions. CDFA stated that when risks to consumers of treated commodities can be reduced to less than one chance in a million of developing tumors in a lifetime, it is considered a negligible risk.

EPA and CDFA calculated cancer risk assessments for consumers of EDB-treated fruit. Both agencies agree that residues should be kept as low as possible and usage should continue only for a short time until alternatives become available. In August 1981, EPA stated that if EDB-treated fruit is allowed to stand in storage or in transit for a sufficient time (4 to 8 days) prior to consumption, the risk to consumers would be minimal during a one year period of use. In October 1981, CDFA stated that a low risk probability can be achieved if EDB per se residue levels in treated fruit do not exceed 0.15 ppm and usage does not exceed one year.[5]

Although an acceptable level of risk was shown for 1 year of exposure, a November 1981 CDFA report showed that for 2 years of exposure the tumor risk doubles to two chances in a million. And for 3 years of exposure, the risk triples to three chances in a million.

An EPA official stated that even if EPA would allow EDB's use to continue for a phaseout period of 2 to 3 years, it would not set an EDB tolerance level. He explained that EPA sets tolerance levels based on the worst exposure case over a 70-year life. Such a tolerance level would be substantially below current EDB residue levels found in citrus, and the citrus industry would not be able to comply with such a standard. Thus, this standard would, in effect, result in the immediate ban of EDB's use as a citrus fumigant. But, again, since no alternative exists, EPA believes EDB's use should be phased out over a 2- to 3-year period. EPA also maintains that during that period, or until mid-1985, the risk to consumers is minimal. But, in it's 1980 report, EPA stated:

"With this option [the 2½-year phaseout] the dietary risks to the U.S. population would continue for 2 to 2½ years. The estimated cancer risks are based on a 70 year lifetime exposure, the cancer risks associated with this interim period of 2 years would be about 2/70 of that risk * * *. In light of the large benefits of EDB that would continue for this period, the Agency finds that these lower risk levels would be acceptable, but only for the 2 to 2½ year period [or, until mid-1983]. Any further continuation of risk would be considered unreasonable."

OSHA was also slow to act on EDB

Like EPA, OSHA received information in the mid-1970's that EDB could cause severe health problems. Moreover, in 1977, NIOSH recommended that OSHA's standards be made more stringent. However, OSHA did not initiate the rulemaking process to revise its standard until December 1981. This action was taken as a result of the 1980-81 California Medfly crisis, the consequent concern expressed by labor unions, and Cal/OSHA's establishment of a much more stringent standard. A final revised OSHA standard is still not expected until at least the summer of 1983.

OSHA's current standard provides that an employee's exposure to airborne EDB shall not exceed an 8-hour, time-weighted average limit of 20 parts of EDB per million parts of air (ppm). This standard was adopted in 1971 as a national consensus standard under section 6(a) of the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 (84 Stat. 1593; 29 U.S.C. 655). The standard was intended to protect workers from injury to lungs, liver, and kidneys. EDB's potential to cause cancer or reproductive damage was not considered in setting the current standard.

In 1977, NIOSH recommended that the acceptable exposure level for EDB should be reduced to 0.13 ppm. The recommendation was based on several scientific reports which indicated that chronic exposure to EDB could lead to cancer and reproductive disorders. In response to NIOSH's recommendation, OSHA published a request in the Federal Register on March 17, 1978, asking for comments on NIOSH's recommendation for a more stringent standard. After reviewing the comments, OSHA took no further action. OSHA officials told us that concrete data was not presented to indicate that a lower standard was necessary.

OSHA took no further action on EDB until the Medfly outbreak in California. In September 1981, as a result of that outbreak, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters petitioned OSHA for an emergency temporary standard for EDB of 0.015 ppm. In October 1981, the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union also petitioned OSHA to impose a 0.015 ppm emergency temporary standard.

OSHA stated that the petitions did not meet the statutory criteria for an emergency standard and therefore denied the petitions. OSHA said that only a limited amount of information was available regarding the nature and extent of employee exposure to EDB on a nationwide basis. Thus, it was not clear that employees handling EDB-treated produce were exposed to a grave danger as expressed in the Occupational Safety and Health Act. OSHA stated that numerous variables in the workplace of those potentially exposed to EDB also made it impossible for the agency to support a finding that the provisions requested by the unions were necessary or feasible.

In denying the petitions, OSHA expressed particular concern regarding its unsuccessful record in setting emergency standards. OSHA stated that of its last five emergency standards which were challenged by various groups, only one was upheld by the courts. OSHA therefore decided that its limited resources would be better utilized in promulgating a permanent standard as soon as possible, based upon the best data available.

On December 18, 1981, OSHA issued an advance notice of proposed rulemaking to receive comments on its intention to revise the present occupational EDB standard. The comment period, originally to end March 1, 1982, was extended to June 1, 1982. OSHA officials told us this was done to allow on-going EDB studies to be completed and the results to be considered by the agency in the advance notice phase of rulemaking.

Also in December 1981, OSHA issued voluntary guidelines to employers and employees suggesting interim measures to limit worker exposure to EDB. The guidelines stress the use of respiratory protection, proper personal hygiene practices, and adequate ventilation for workers facing the highest potential exposure—that is, from EDB's use as a pesticide.

On September 2, 1981, Cal/OSHA adopted an emergency temporary standard for EDB. The standard was made permanent on March 21, 1982. The standard provided that no employee be exposed to EDB in excess of an 8-hour, time-weighted average of 0.13 ppm. The standard was based on a review of the scientific data available, most notably a June 1981 National Cancer Institute inhalation study of EDB and NIOSH's 1977 recommendation of a 0.13 ppm standard. (NIOSH reiterated its recommendation on October 26, 1981.)

Cal/OSHA's emergency and permanent standards were upheld in court four separate occasions.

On October 27, 1981, the Florida Citrus Packers and other Florida corporations filed motions in a U.S. District Court asking for a temporary restraining order against the emergency temporary standard. The court ruled in favor of Cal/OSHA's standard.

On November 30, 1981, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the U.S. District Court order finding that "the risk of injury resulting from exposer to higher concentrations of Ethylene Dibromide weighs more heavily in the balance of harm than appellants' loss of profits."

On December 4, 1981, the Superior Court, County of Sacramento, denied Western Growers' Association's petition which challenged Cal/OSHA's emergency standard. The court found the emergency standard to have been properly adopted.

On July 26, 1982, in a suit filed by Florida Citrus Packers and other Florida citrus corporations, a U.S. District Court in California ruled in favor of Cal/OSHA's permanent standard. The court ruled that California did not need prior Federal OSHA approval to set and enforce a more stringent EDB worker exposure standard.

Confusion surrounds EDB's air standards

Although USDA, EPA, and OSHA, have attempted to coordinate their EDB regulatory activities, problems still exist. Conflicting reports on the safe exposure level have caused confusion and concern on the part of workers.

Conflicting safe exposure levels

Along with the renewed outbreak of the Medfly in California in the summer of 1981, the regulatory controversy surrounding EDB's safety surfaced. Produce workers became aware of the conflicting reports on safe EDB air exposure levels:

OSHA's standard is 20 ppm.

In 1977, NIOSH had recommended that the standard should be 0.13 ppm.

EPA's December 1980 preliminary RPAR determination called for a standard of 0.40 ppm.

In August 1981, Cal/OSHA's Standards Board originally recommended a standard of 0.015 ppm. (Later, Cal/OSHA set the standard at 0.13 ppm.)

Workers and employers were confused and concerned as to what was an appropriate and safe level of exposure. Consequently, longshoremen refused to load EDB-fumigated fruit destined for Japan. When Japanese workers heard about the problem, they also refused to handle EDB-treated produce. The problem was compounded by the Japanese Government's requirement that all citrus from California (not just fruit from specified regulated areas within the State)

[5] Both EPA's and CDFA's calculations (1) assumed that 2.6 percent of the U.S. citrus crop would be treated with EDB and (2) used the most conservative mathematical risk assessment model.

for export to Japan must be treated with EDB.

California workers' concerns were alleviated when Cal/OSHA established its own EDB standard of 0.13 ppm. But this standard is applicable only within California. In other States, the controversy remains as to the appropriate, safe EDB exposure level.

Interagency task force

To review EDB-related problems, an EDB interagency task force comprised of USDA, EPA, and OSHA officials was formed at the direction of the President's Office of Science and Technology Policy in the fall of 1981. The task force did not arrive at any conclusions or recommended course of action regarding EDB issues. Although no official statement from the task force has been released, our discussions with agency officials disclosed that all three agencies agree that

EDB is potentially a very hazardous substance and should be handled properly and with extreme care;

EDB is still needed as a pest fumigant on a number of agricultural products; and

More data is needed on (1) levels of EDB retained in fumigated citrus as well as its packaging material and (2) employee exposure levels following fumigation.

In regard to the latter, in November 1981, the three agencies jointly contracted with a consulting firm to develop such data. Although this data will be helpful, officials from the three agencies declined to speculate whether this study alone would resolve EDB's regulatory problems.

Even with the interagency task force and the joint contract, problems still persist. For example, USDA and EPA were not consulted before OSHA issued its recommended procedures to reduce worker exposure to EDB. Consequently, USDA, EPA, and now OSHA have published different (although similar in content) sets of recommended or proposed measures for adequate protection of applicators and workers exposed to EDB. Furthermore, EPA and OSHA officials told us that although they are "talking" to each other, they have not formally agreed to develop one EDB air exposure standard.

EDB issues needing resolution

Although the involved Federal agencies have taken steps to remedy EDB-related problems, several issues remain unresolved. Since 1975, scientific studies have indicated that EDB has the potential to cause serious health effects, yet to date (1) an acceptable alternative has not been approved or implemented and (2) Federal regulatory agencies have not reached a final decision on appropriate EDB standards.

The following EDB issues are unresolved:

1. Does EPA's tentative deadline of banning EDB's use as a citrus fumigant by mid-1985 coincide with FDA, APHIS, ARS, and private industry estimates of when an alternative will be approved and implemented?

2. Regarding irradiation of citrus, what is needed to approve it as a quarantine treatment method? How are these needs to be satisfied? Which agency is responsible for each need?

3. Would better coordination between USDA and FDA on irradiation issues (1) avoid conflicting requirements or standards and (2) minimize duplication of effort by the two agencies? (Irradiation is an identified potential alternative to EDB in fumigating citrus, but it has yet to be approved for use by the responsible regulatory agencies, FDA and USDA. Both agencies are concerned with irradiation's (1) effectiveness at preventing the spread of the pest and (2) effective on the marketability of the produce.)

4. Should APHIS' quarantine treatment criterion and its rationale be established in writing and clearly communicated to ARS? Should APHIS respond to ARS' concerns about the appropriateness of the criterion? Who should resolve any disputes?

5. Regarding EDB's air exposure standard, should there be one Federal air exposure standard for workers? If more than one standard, why? To which group or classification of workers would each standard apply? If one standard, why are two agencies presently developing or revising their own EDB worker exposure standards? Would better coordination between EPA and OSHA (1) minimize duplication of effort and (2) avoid conflicting standards or protective measures?

6. Since the technology is available to detect the EDB per se residue in or on agricultural products, would an EDB per se residue standard be more appropriate (than the present inorganic bromide standard), particularly if EDB's use is allowed during a phaseout period? (EPA's 1980 report on EDB indicated that the dietary risk to the U.S. population would be unacceptable at present tolerance levels after mid-1983.)

ETHYLENE DIBROMIDE

(By Michael M. Simpson, Analyst in Life Sciences, Science Policy Research Division)

INTRODUCTION

Ethylene dibromide (EDB) is an organic, i.e., carbon-containing, chemical also known as 1,2 dibromoethane, ethylene bromide, and symdibromoethane. It has been used in several ways: as a fumigant for ground pest control, for stored grain and grain milling machinery, for citrus and other tropical fruits; as an additive to leaded gasoline (to clean lead deposits out of gasoline engines); as a constituent of fire extinguishing chemicals, gauge fluids, and waterproofing preparations; and as a solvent for celluloid, fats, oils and waxes. About 200 million pounds of EDB were produced in this country in 1980, with about 143 million pounds used domestically. An estimated 110 million pounds of EDB went into leaded gasoline in 1980; this was about 77 percent of domestic use. About 15 million pounds of EDB were used as a pesticide in 1980 (about 10 percent of domestic use). While use of the chemical in leaded gasoline is a major source of EDB emissions (with EDB evaporating during fuel pumping and from fuel tanks and carburetors), recent concerns have focused on EDB as a pesticide.

Previously, nematodes and other soil pests were controlled by fumigation with EDB of the soil prior to planting several types of fruits and vegetables. Soil fumigation with EDB occurred primarily in California, Hawaii, and the Southern States; the groundwater in California, Hawaii, Florida, and Georgia have been found to contain EDB residues. Consequently, permission to use EDB as a soil fumigant was suspended by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) in September 1983.

The EPA also ordered the termination of use of EDB as a spot fumigant of grain and milling machinery, but the order was appealed and EDB can still be used during the appeal process. EDB has been found in grain and grain products, e.g., breads and cake mixes, at concentrations up to several thousand parts per billion (ppb) in raw grain products, and up to several hundred ppb in baked goods. EPA has known of the presence of EDB in grains and baked goods for some years. An EPA document of 1980 cites studies from 1978 reporting that EDB does not completely dissipate from grains and baked goods. The State of Florida has ordered a halt to the sale of various grain products, including cake mixes, grits, and floor, found to contain at least 1 ppb of EDB. Massachusetts, Maine, Texas, and California are four of at least 20 States now testing for EDB residues.

Besides soil fumigation and fumigation of grain, EDB has been used to fumigate citrus to prevent the spread of fruit flies. Treated fruits have been found to contain up to 5000 ppb of EDB.

To date, the EPA has not established tolerance or regulations of EDB in agriculture, except for soybeans (1 ppb), although such action is expected by mid-February 1984. The EPA has published "health advisories" regarding EDB in drinking water. EPA estimates that lifetime exposure to EDB in drinking water at the following concentrations would produce the corresponding excess cancer risks:

0.02 ppb (0.02 microgram/liter), 3×10^{-5}.
0.1 ppb (0.1 microgram/liter), 1.5×10^{-4}.
1 ppb (1 microgam/liter), 1.5×10^{-3}.

Several other environmental chemicals have been regulated around the point where their excess cancer risk is 1×10^{-6} (i.e., one in a million), or 1×10^{-5}; all the risks indicated above exceed those values.

The announcement of the presence of EDB in groundwater, citrus, and grains and baked goods has prompted much concern.

HEALTH EFFECTS OF EDB

Acute effects

EDB in extended contact with the skin may cause reddening, blistering, and sores; these reactions sometimes may not be visible for 1-2 days. The skin may become sensitized to EDB, i.e., smaller amounts of the chemical would lead to reactions with future exposures. EDB vapor is a severe irritant to the eyes and mucous membranes of the respiratory tract. Inhalation of the vapor may result in severe acute respiratory injury, reduction in the functioning of the central nervous system, and severe vomiting. Persistence of symptoms is dependent upon the magnitude and duration of exposure, general health of the individual, and promptness and extent of medical intervention. When death occurs, it appears to be due to respiratory or circulatory failure, complicated by fluid in the lungs, with possible liver and kidney damage. A 150 pound person ingesting between 1 teaspoon and 1 ounce of EDB would probably die.

Long-term effects

The International Agency for Research on Cancer (IARC) has positively determined that EDB causes cancer in animals.

On Dec. 14, 1977 the EPA issued a rebuttable presumption against registration (RPAR) for EDB for pesticide uses on the basis of the chemical's capacity to cause tumors, mutate genes, and adversely affect reproduction. Adverse reproductive effects in mice have been observed at doses as small as 20 parts per million (ppm) in air. Tumorigenesis has been observed in rats breathing 10 ppm EDB in air. Other rats developed tumors after eating feed mixed with 2 grams of EDB per kilogram of body weight (2 g/kg).

HEALTH EFFECTS OF ALTERNATIVES TO EDB

It is because of EDB's possible health effects that interest has been expressed in finding alternatives to the chemical. Several chemicals have been approved by the EPA as alternatives to EDB for various uses: carbon disulfide; carbon tetrachloride; ethylene dichloride; and methyl bromide. All are designed to kill pests; as such, none is "safe" in an absolute sense.

Acute effects

Carbon Disulfide

Exposure to carbon disulfide can result in irritated eyes, stomach, mucous membranes and respiratory tract; blistered, burned, or sensitized skin; altered hormonal balances; and psychological and behavioral disorders including uncontrollable anger, suicidal tendencies, and extreme irritability. The probable lethal oral dose for a 150 pound person is between 1 ounce and 1 pint.

Carbon Tetrachloride

Carbon tetrachloride removes oils from the skin and can cause skin to become dry and cracked. It can irritate the eyes. The functioning of the central nervous system can be reduced following exposure to carbon tetrachloride. Nausea, vomiting, diarrhea, liver and kidney damage, jaundice, blood in urine, and coma can also result from exposure to the chemical. The EPA issued an RPAR for carbon tetrachloride on Oct. 15, 1980 on the basis of the chemical's capacity to damage the liver and kidney (hepatotoxicity and nephrotoxicity). A 150 pound person ingesting between 1 teaspoon and 1 ounce of the chemical will probably die.

Ethylene Dichloride

Like the previously mentioned alternatives, exposure to ethylene dichloride can result in dry and cracked skin. Liquid or vapor forms of the chemical can damage the eyes. Nausea, vomiting, confusion, dizziness, fluid in the lungs, and respiratory and circulatory failure can occur following exposure to the chemical. The probable lethal oral dose for a 150 pound person is between one ounce and one pint.

Methyl Bromide

Exposure to methyl bromide can result in irritated eyes, skin, and mucous membranes. Fluids can accumulate in the lungs. Malaise, visual disturbances, headaches, nausea, vomiting, and tremor can occur following exposure. The probable lethal oral dose for a 150 pound person is between one teaspoon and one ounce.

Long-term effects

Carbon Disulfide

Atherosclerosis and coronary heart disease are two possible long-term effects of exposure to carbon disulfide. The peripheral nerves can also degenerate in time. Adverse effects on reproduction have been observed in rats breathing 50 milligrams of carbon disulfide per cubic meter of air (50 mg/m^3 air). There are no reports of data pertaining to the capacity of this chemical to cause tumors.

Carbon Tetrachloride

Adverse effects on reproduction have been observed in rats breathing 250 ppm carbon tetrachloride in air, or ingesting 2 g/kg of the chemical. Tumors have developed in hamsters after eating 3 g/kg carbon tetrachloride in feed. Rats developed tumors when carbon tetrachloride was administered under their skins at 31 g/kg. The EPA issued an RPAR for carbon tetrachloride on Oct. 15, 1980 on the basis of the chemical's capacity to cause tumors.

Ethylene Dichloride

There are no reports of data pertaining to the capacity of this chemical to cause adverse reproductive effects. Tumors developed in rats and mice breathing 5 ppm ethylene dichloride in air. Other rats ate 5 g/kg ethylene dichloride in their feed and developed tumors, as did mice at 3.5 g/kg. Gastrointestinal problems, neurological changes, liver and kidney damage, and death are the principal long-term health effects in humans exposed to the chemical. An equal dose of ethylene dichloride will usually cause less severe damage to the liver and kidneys than carbon tetrachloride.

Methyl Bromide

There are no data reported pertaining to the capacity of this chemical to cause adverse reproductive effects or tumors. Lethargy, mental confusion, and disturbances in speech, visual, and sensory functions are the most common long-term complaints associated with exposure to methyl bromide.

According to the EPA, not only have these chemicals been approved as substitutes for EDB for many uses, they are also less costly to purchase. Agriculture firms and workers may prefer EDB partially because it is easier to apply and work with (e.g., proper use of some chemical alternatives to EDB requires that the building containing grain milling machinery be sealed; further, the sticky nature of some of the alternatives makes them more difficult to work with), and partially because of familiarity with working with EDB.

Two physical alternatives to some uses of EDB been proposed and used on limited bases: irradiation, and long-term cold storage. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration presently does not allow irradiated foods in commerce. Irradiating foods may produce chemicals in the foods which may have adverse health effects (for details, please see CRS white paper "Preservation of Food by Irradiation" by Donna Porter, June 21, 1983). Long-term cold storage has been used as an alternative to EDB for a shipment of citrus to Japan. There are current questions about the cost and availability of both irradiation and cold storage facilities as alternatives to EDB for fruit if used on a national scale.

STANDARDS

Table 1 summarizes the Federal standards pertaining to EDB and the chemical alternatives previously described. The Federal occupational exposure standards for ethylene dichloride were established to prevent toxic effects other than cancer, and thus may not provide adequate protection from potential carcinogenicity.

POINTS FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION

(1) Should the Federal Government allow the blending of grains containing high levels of EDB with grains containing low levels to produce grains containing acceptable levels of EDB?

(2) Should there be a separate standard for EDB: in raw grains; in baked goods; in products designed for cooking by the consumer, e.g., cookie mixes; in citrus and other fruits and vegetables; in groundwater?

(3) Should labels be required warning of possible hazards in eating unbaked cookie dough?

(4) Should there be Federal monitoring for EDB residues in foods and water?

(5) Should there be Federal requirements for the amount of time and degree of ventilation of stored grains (to allow for the dissipation of EDB)?

(6) Would a ban of EDB force the timely and economically acceptable development of alternative chemicals with all of EDB's qualities and none of its faults?

(7) How feasible are long-term cold storage and/or irradiation as substitutes for EDB?

(8) What should the Federal role be in the reclamation of groundwater resources contaminated with EDB?

(9) What should the Federal government do about human exposures to EDB via leaded gasoline?

Congress may wish to consider some or all of these questions.

REVIVING THE NUCLEAR ARMS TALKS

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the congressional delegation that attended the Twenty-third U.S. Congress-European Parliament Exchange meeting at the headquarters of the Parliament of Europe in Strasbourg, France, on January 20 and 21, I was requested to present a paper dealing with the problem of nuclear missile deployment in Europe and the now suspended negotiations dealing with such missiles.

Since then, I have had numerous requests for copies of the paper I presented. Since it deals with a subject of great and timely importance, I offer it for printing in the RECORD today.

In the paper, I recommended that the United States promptly offer to delay further deployment of the Pershing II and U.S. cruise missiles in Europe, if the Soviet Union will impose a similar moratorium and agree to resume negotiations over United States and Soviet missiles.

In my speech, I also supported a number of other steps to reduce the risk of nuclear war. These included:

First, combining the INF and START negotiations into a single negotiation;

Second, a commitment by NATO countries to forgo the first use of nuclear weapons in Europe, moving instead to a policy of deterring any Soviet nonnuclear aggression there solely by the use of NATO's nonnuclear forces;

Third, negotiating for a nuclear-free zone on both sides of the border in Europe;

Fourth, reducing NATO's tactical nuclear weapons in Europe to 3,000 from the current 6,000, and Fifth, freezing tactical nuclear weapons modernization programs.

I also pointed out that the bellicose posturing of President Reagan and other top administration officials over the last 3 years has been counterproductive toward meaningful arms control efforts and has undermined the confidence of America's allies.

I added that such negative results are compounded when coupled with policies and programs aimed at getting the jump on the other side. Calling them illusory and destabilizing, cited as among such programs the Soviet SS-20 missile, the U.S. MX missile, the U.S. antisatellite program, and President Reagan's proposed "star wars" antimissile program.

The speech concluded with the following:

Almost as disturbing as the immense numbers and appalling destructive power of the nuclear weapons stockpiles is the feeling of drift and loss of control that is brought about by the almost total absence of constructive, imaginative leadership for arms control at the highest governmental levels in either of the two superpowers. It is this, after all, that has, I believe, sparked the nuclear freeze movement in the United States (supported by 85 percent of the population according to the latest public opinion polls) and the strong anti-nuclear movement in various countries of the European Community. At the same time, there is strong majority support, both in the U.S. and Western Europe, for NATO and for maintaining an effective defense against possible Soviet aggression.

These two sets of facts, side by side, constitute a powerful vote of no confidence against the continuing nuclear arms buildup. They also provide a mandate for politicians to take a new direction, away from policies that entail the threat of total destruction and toward policies that emphasize stability and nuclear arms control and reduction.

The full text of my paper follows:

A DEMOCRATIC PERSPECTIVE ON THE INTERMEDIATE RANGE NUCLEAR WEAPONS NEGOTIATIONS

(By Congressman John F. Seiberling)

When asked to present a Democratic Perspective on Intermediate Range Nuclear Weapons Negotiations, my first reaction was to recall the famous remark of the American humorist, Will Rogers, who said, "I do not belong to any organized political party: I am a Democrat."

Certainly, at this point the Democratic party has no stated positions on this subject that I am aware of, beyond support for our country's long-standing commitment to support NATO. However, I think I can say that the views I am about to express are shared by a substantial number of my colleagues in Congress and, to a large degree, by the leading Democratic presidential candidates.

Since the end of World War II, both the Republican and Democratic parties, every U.S. president, the Congress, and the American public have been strongly committed to the defense of Western Europe, including deterrence of a nuclear attack on Western Europe. The American commitment is given substance by the presence of several hundred thousand American military personnel stationed in Europe, by the NATO alliance, and by America's economic, ethnic, cultural and historic ties with Europe. I see no likelihood that that commitment will falter, so long as it is desired on this side of the Atlantic.

I assume that each of you are generally familiar with the evolution of NATO defense policy, including the decision in 1979 to proceed with the eventual deployment of 108 U.S. Pershing II and 464 ground-launched cruise missiles (GLCM's) in Europe. The highlights are laid out quite well in an article by former U.S. Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara, entitled, "The Military Role of Nuclear Weapons: Perceptions and Misperceptions," published in the Fall, 1983 issue of Foreign Affairs. I have brought with me a few extra copies of that excellent article for any of you who wish to read it.

It should be emphasized that NATO's 1979 decision was not just a decision for deploying intermediate-range nuclear missiles (INF). An equally important part of the "two track" decision was the second track, namely to seek agreement with the Soviet Union to reduce or eliminate intermediate-range missiles on both sides.

I also assume that each of you are generally familiar with the history of INF negotiations between the U.S. and Soviet representatives in Geneva, which went on intermittently from November, 1981 until they were broken off by the Soviets in November, 1983. An exceptionally informative account of the unhappy course of those negotiations appeared in the December 5, 1983 issue of Time magazine, in an article by Strobe Talbott. The article reveals some of the bitter divisions within the Reagan Administration over these negotiations. I have a few extra copies of that article also, if anyone would like to have it.

We in the congressional delegation are, of course, very interested in hearing the views of the European delegation as to the political impact in Europe of the suspension of the INF talks. Viewed from our side of the Atlantic, the political situation here seems increasingly precarious, especially in Germany. We are getting the impression that a continuation of present trends could well lead before too long to the end of NATO as a viable military alliance.

In the U.S. there is a widespread feeling that the Reagan Administration has not been sufficiently flexible or serious in the Geneva negotiations, its primary objective being deployment of Pershing IIs and GLCMs. Whether this impression is the result of a conscious choice or merely the net effect of disarray within the Administration is not altogether clear. There is also the feeling that, contrary to its oft-expressed view that actual deployment of the Pershing II would produce Soviet concessions, the Reagan Administration may have already fumbled its best opportunity, namely the "walk-in-the-woods" proposal, to negotiate reductions in Soviet missiles.[1] Amidst the official proclamations that the start of the new missile deployment was a great diplomatic victory for NATO, some high officials within the Reagan Administration are reported to believe that the Administration seriously miscalculated as to the Soviet response.[2]

In any case, NATO and the U.S. are now confronted with the necessity of reviewing their posture and probably developing a new negotiating position. In my opinion, the first essential step in this process must be a reevaluation of the basic strategy on which NATO's defenses are based.

In 1967, NATO adopted the strategy of "flexible response," whereby it proposed to deter any Soviet aggression by maintaining forces adequate to counter an attack at whatever level the Soviets chose to fight. This strategy includes "first use" of nuclear weapons, if necessary, including the threat of escalation all the way to strategic nuclear weapons. However, when the Soviet Union achieved rough parity with U.S. strategic nuclear forces, the strategic nuclear weapons element of the flexible response strategy lost its credibility.[3]

Official NATO doctrine, however, retains the first use option. The rationale for this is described by McNamara as follows:

". . . those who assert that the nuclear first use threat serves to strengthen NATO's conventional deterrent believe that, regardless of objective assessments of the irrationality of any such action, Soviet decisionmakers must pay attention to the realities of the battlefield and the dangers of the escalatory process. And, in so doing, they maintain, the Soviets will perceive a considerable risk that conventional conflict will lead to the use of battlefield [nuclear] weapons, which will lead in turn to theater-wide nuclear conflict, which will inevitably spread to the homelands of the superpowers." [4]

This theory of deterrence, it was thought, would avoid the "decoupling" of the U.S. strategic nuclear deterrent from the defense of Europe. However, this rationale has also, it seems to me, been effectively demolished for the reasons explained by McNamara as follows:

". . . it was a desire to strengthen the perception of such a likely escalation that led NATO to its December 1979 decision to deploy the new intermediate-range Pershing II and the nuclear-armed cruise missiles in Europe. The key element in that decision was that the new missiles would be capable of striking Soviet territory, thus presumably precipitating a Soviet attack on U.S. territory and a U.S. retaliation against the whole of the Soviet homeland. The new weapons thus 'couple' U.S. strategic forces with the forces deployed in Europe, easing concerns that the Soviets might perceive a firebreak in the escalatory process. So long as the escalation is perceived to be likely to proceed smoothly, the logic continues, then the Warsaw Pact will be deterred from taking the first step—the conventional aggression—which might start the process.

"But for the same reason that led Henry Kissinger to recognize that a U.S. President is unlikely to initiate the use of U.S.-based strategic nuclear weapons against the U.S.S.R., so a President would be unlikely to launch missiles from European soil against Soviet territory.

"And, as I have indicated, more and more Western political and military leaders are coming to recognize, and publicly avowing, that even the use of battlefield nuclear weapons in Europe would bring greater destruction to NATO than any conceivable contribution they might make to NATO's defense.

"There is less and less likelihood, therefore, that NATO would authorize the use of any nuclear weapons, except in response to a Soviet nuclear attack. As this diminishing prospect becomes more and more widely perceived—and it will—whatever deterrent value still resides in NATO's nuclear strategy will diminish still further." [5]

In addition to its diminishing credibility as a deterrent, NATO's first use threat contributes to political tensions and divisions in Western Europe, reduces support for NATO's conventional forces, and may actually invite preemptive nuclear strikes by the Soviets in event of a war in Europe.[6] The Pershing IIs, especially, would tend to invite such preemptive strikes, since their most likely use would be against Soviet command and control facilities and other high-value targets, which the Soviets are likely to seek to protect at the outbreak of hostilities.

McNamara's proposed remedy to this unsatisfactory state of affairs is for NATO, at a summit meeting of its heads of government, to announce the intention of the Alliance to move to a policy of deterrence of Soviet conventional force aggression solely through the use of NATO's non-nuclear forces. This would require a simultaneous commitment to make the relatively modest additional expenditures to improve NATO's conventional military forces.[7]

While NATO's conventional forces are being strengthened, additional steps could be taken to reduce the risk of nuclear war. McNamara suggest that these include: [8]

(1) Halting tactical nuclear weapons modernization programs.

(2) Reducing NATO's tactical nuclear weapons in Europe to 3,000 or less.

(3) Negotiating for a nuclear-free zone on both sides of the border in Europe.

To these I would add a number of other steps. The most immediate problem is how to revive the negotiations on INF weapons and halt the deployment of additional Soviet weapons in Europe. It seems unlikely that this can be done while the U.S. is proceeding with the deployment of its new missiles, especially the Pershing II. Accordingly, I believe an offer should be promptly made by the U.S. to extend the current pause in the deployment schedule for a reasonable time if the Soviets will agree to impose a comparable moratorium on their INF deployment and agree to return to the negotiations.

In addition to its obvious advantages, such a delay is desirable from the standpoint of future arms control, particularly as it relates to ground-launched cruise missiles. The problem of the GLCMs has been well summarized by a Democratic Presidential candidate, Senator John Glenn, as follows:

"Unlike air-launched cruise missiles—which can be verified and actually enhance our abiility to deter war—ground-launched cruise missiles could be extremely destabilizing. And once the Soviets upgrade their own cruise missile capability, our advantage today could become their advantage tomorrow.

"A cruise missile race would be a major setback for the cause of arms control—and I believe we must make one last-ditch effort to keep it from occurring. To demonstrate our good faith, the United States should initiate a temporary moratorium on deployment of ground-launched cruise missiles—at least until the Soviets have a chance to accept or reject a balanced and equitable agreement." [9]

However, reconvening the INF negotiations will accomplish little unless both sides are prepared to advance realistic proposals in a serious atmosphere. This means that negotiations should be carried on privately, through the negotiators, and not through the news media, as has largely been the case up to now. Furthermore, it is difficult to see how any proposal can be considered unless it deals in some way with the British and French intermediate range missiles.[10]

As an additional step toward reviving the negotiations, the U.S., in consultation with NATO, should propose combining the INF and START talks into a single negotiation. Since the two are interdependent anyway, combining the two negotiations into one should actually simplify the process while giving greater flexibility for accommodating such factors as the British and French missiles.[11]

If the Reagan Administration is truly serious and objective about arms control, none of the foregoing steps should present any great internal difficulty. The same may be said as to the Soviet Union. However, even if these steps are taken, they are not likely to succeed unless there are some significant shifts in attitudes, tactics and even basic policy on both sides. Here I'll confine my suggestions to our side, it being the only one over which we have any control.

The ideal negotiator is tough but flexible, firm but polite. Paul Nitze is such a negotiator. So was Paul Warnke. The Soviets respect that kind of approach. On the other hand, they take scathing denunciations and insults seriously when they come from the President of the United States himself and from other top officials. When to these are added bellicose and needlessly militaristic rhetoric, the net effect can only be counterproductive if our aim is to create receptiveness for our arms control proposals and confidence among our allies. Democratic Presidential candidate, and former Vice President, Walter Mondale, has put the problem succinctly:

"Today, by all rights, the young people of Europe should be marching against the Soviet SS-20s pointed at them. Instead, they're marching against an Administration which spoke casually of nuclear warning shots and 'winnable' nuclear war." [12]

Such negative results are compounded when they are coupled with policies and programs which appear to be not merely efforts to maintain a balance or to avoid surprise, but to get the "jump" on the other side. This is what arms control consultant Sidney Drell calls "the fallacy of the last move." [13] MIRV was such a move on the U.S. side. It was followed by the Soviet's MIRVed SS-18. This, in turn, is being countered by the U.S. MX missile in a destabilizing, first-strike basing mode. Deployment of excessive numbers of SS-20s in Europe was such a move on the Soviet side. It, in turn, has provoked the Pershing II deployment.

In another such move, the Reagan Administration is pressing ahead to develop an anti-satellite (ASAT) weapon, despite a Soviet offer of a treaty to ban such weapons. ASAT weapons are opposed by a large segment of the scientific community on the basis that they serve little or no defensive purpose, and merely threaten to broaden the arms race to include space. Once testing of the U.S. ASAT is completed, its deployment will be unverifiable. Worse yet, ASAT weapons will make vulnerable the principal means we and the Soviets have of monitoring arms control agreements and guarding against a nuclear attack. Full-scale deployment of these weapons will push both sides to adopt a launch-on-warning posture, greatly increasing the risk of accidental nuclear war.[14]

President Reagan's proposed "Star Wars" anti-missile defense program is another "last move." In addition to having a truly astronomical cost potential and being both illusory and destabilizing, it reveals a state of mind that envisions an endless arms race, rather than nuclear arms control and reduction, as the pattern for the rest of this century and far into the next century. What does that say about the seriousness of the Administration's commitment to arms control?

Such policies and programs, coming on top of hostile and inflammatory rhetoric, surely do not help create the kind of atmosphere conducive to winding down the already terrifying scale of nuclear weapons competition. The situation is well-summarized by Paul Warnke:

"I do not think that anybody who has studied the subject would be in favor of [unilaterally] eliminating our nuclear weapons. I would not want to depend on Soviet charity or philanthropy to prevent them from exploiting that advantage.

"The question is, What do we need in order to have an effective deterrent against the use or threatened use of Soviet nuclear weapons? What I would answer is, We have plenty, and we don't need any more. What we ought to do is explore every possibility for effective nuclear arms control, such as a nuclear freeze, arms reductions, and qualitative control. What our current policy looks like, I am afraid, is not an effort just to maintain a deterrent, but an effort to build up a nuclear war-fighting and war-winning capability. That is the risk, and if we follow that course, I can guarantee the other side is going to follow it too. As a consequence, the nuclear abyss comes closer and closer."[15]

Almost as disturbing as the immense numbers and appalling destructive power of the nuclear weapons stockpiles is the feeling of drift and loss of control that is brought about by the almost total absence of constructive, imaginative leadership for arms control at the highest governmental levels in either of the two superpowers. It is this, after all, that has, I believe, sparked the nuclear freeze movement in the U.S. (supported by 85 percent of the population according to the latest public opinion polls) and the strong anti-nuclear movement in various countries of the European Community. At the same time, there is strong majority support, both in the U.S. and western Europe, for NATO and for maintaining an effective defense against possible Soviet aggression.

These two sets of facts, side by side, constitute a powerful vote of no confidence against the continuing nuclear arms buildup. They also provide a mandate for politicians to take a new direction, away from policies that entail the threat of total destruction and toward policies that emphasize stability and nuclear arms control and reduction.

Millions of our citizens appear to have grasped better than many of their leaders the simple fact that, in the nuclear age, neither side can survive unless the other survives. Being simple and inescapable, there is even cause to believe that this fact will, sooner or later, not merely penetrate, but dominate the thinking of leaders on both sides of this sadly divided world. And, as Winston Churchill once remarked, "Facts are better than dreams."

FOOTNOTES

[1] The refusal to authorize the U.S. negotiators to pursue the Nitze-Kvitsinsky "walk-in-the-woods" proposal was reportedly made by President Reagan himself. Whether the Soviet leadership would have accepted the proposal if it had been offered officially is, of course, a moot question.

[2] An article by Walter Pincus in the Washington Post for December 18, 1983, states:

"Faced with the Soviet walkouts in Geneva and Vienna, a few officials say they may have underestimated Moscow's response to the new U.S. missiles, particularly the Pershings, which can hit targets inside Russia within 12 minutes.

"One key Reagan administration official, who along with others said that the first deployment of U.S. missiles in Europe would force the Soviets to negotiate seriously, now believes that the Soviet Union will begin a major buildup of nuclear missile forces in Europe and near the U.S. mainland before returning to arms control negotiations with the United States."

[3] Robert S. McNamara, "The Military Role of Nuclear Weapons: Perceptions and Misperceptions," Foreign Affairs, Fall, 1983, pp. 59-80. McNamara describes the situation as follows:

"Given the tremendous devastation which those Soviet strategic forces that survived a U.S. first strike would now be able to inflict on this country, it is difficult to imagine any U.S. President, under any circumstances, initiating a strategic strike except in retaliation against a Soviet nuclear strike. (McNamara, Ibid. p. 67)

". . . As I have indicated, the launch of strategic nuclear weapons against the Soviet homeland would lead almost certainly to a response in kind which would inflict unacceptable damage on Europe and the United States—it would be an act of suicide. The threat of such an action, therefore, has lost all credibility as a deterrent to Soviet conventional aggression. The ultimate sanction in the flexible response strategy is thus no longer operative. One cannot build a credible deterrent on an incredible action." (McNamara, Ibid. p. 73)

[9] Remarks of Senator John Glenn to the National Press Club, Washington, D.C., October 12, 1983.

[10] Members of this delegation can personally confirm the Soviet position on this. At our meeting on January 11, 1983 in Moscow with Yuliy Kvitsinsky, the top Soviet INF negotiator, the following dialogue took place, as summarized from my personal notes taken at the meeting:

Kvitsinsky: "The Zero Option is unfair. It would have been fair if the U.K. and France did not have any missiles. But since that is not the case, and since the U.S. proposal does not deal with British and French missiles, it is meaningless.

"We are prepared to have a Zero Option between the U.S. and the USSR if there were some offset by reducing British and French missiles."

Rep. Lantos: "No one rationally argues that British and French missiles are a threat to the Soviet Union."

Kvitsinsky: "Isn't NATO a coordinated defense organization? The balance of forces has always taken into account the total forces on both sides. Mitterand himself said that that the French INF missiles are an addition to the NATO forces. It would be hard to imagine that, in any European war, France would be on the side of the Soviet Union."

Another pertinent dialogue is the following between former Democratic Congressman Jonathan Bingham and Paul Warnke, former Director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disaramament Agency (ACDA), and chief SALT negotiator in the Carter Administration:

Mr. Bingham: "Does it make any sense for us to maintain that the French and British nuclear forces are to be left out of the calculation in discussing what is a reasonable balance in the European theater?"

Mr. Warnke: "I think it is quite clear that the Soviets will not leave those forces out in their own consideration of what sort of an agreement they would be prepared to accept. We cannot negotiate for the British and the French. I think there is very little chance that they will come into these negotiations because their forces are so small that any substantial cutback would eliminate them entirely, but that is a decision that is theirs to make. What we ought to do is tell the Europeans that we are prepared to accept any agreement that is good enough for them. Obviously, that agreement on the part of the Soviets would have to reflect, on their part, some consideration of the French and British military forces."

(As reported in "Defense Sense: The Search for a Rational Military Policy," edited by Congressman Ron Dellums, Ballinger Publishing Company, 1983, p. 44.)

[11] This course is strongly supported by Democratic Presidential candidate, Senator John Glenn:

"I believe we should urge the Soviets to bring the START and INF negotiations together into a single forum. Clearly, the security of NATO is inseparable from the strategic security of the United States—and I see no good reason for keeping the talks separate. Obviously, 'intermediate-range' Pershing missiles that can hit vital Soviet targets are of strategic importance to the Russians. And it is equally clear that Soviet SS-20 missiles capable of reaching the United States are strategic to us—even though they may be deployed in Asia. And in the final analysis, it will do little good to reduce intermediate-range missiles in one corner of the globe if those same missiles are eventually deployed in another part of the world. For all these reasons, I believe the time has come to bring strategic and intermediate-range force negotiations together—in the same room and under the same negotiators." (Glenn, October 12, 1983, speech, supra).

To the same effect, see Sidney Drell, "Facing the Threat of Nuclear Weapons," University of Washington Press, 1983, pp. 51-53. Drell, himself a distinguished scientist and arms control expert, spells out some specifics for combined negotiations. Paul Warnke likewise has urged combining the two negotiations.

[12] Walter Mondale, Speech to the Coalition for a Democratic Majority, Washington, D.C., November 15, 1983.

[13] Drell, supra, p. 79.

[14] Mr. Kenneth Adelman, the current of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, has publicly stated that the U.S. is "not interested" in negotiating a ban on ASATs. Fortunately, however, Congress has directed the administration not to proceed with final flight testing to the F-15 ASAT until a serious effort has been made to negotiate a treaty banning such weapons. Senator John Glenn's comments on this weapon are significant:

"And while we're trying to get an agreement with the Soviets on ground-launched cruise missles, why don't we also try to negotiate a ban on anti-satellite weapons? Right now, these weapons are still in their formative stages—and if we can stop them, now is the time to do it. Although the Soviets have already employed a crude anti-satellite system of their own, they have indicated a willingness to talk about dismantling it. And I think we owe it to humanity to find out if they're serious." (Glenn, October 12, 1983 speech, supra).

Therefore, according to TWA/CATO a credit is due on the ticket in the amount of $163. Congressman Levitas did not receive a credit receipt for the amount due because of the tremendous congestion in the airport (at the time of the heavy snowstorm.)

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LEGISLATION INTRODUCED TO STUDY FEASIBILITY OF RAIL TRANSIT LINK TO DULLES INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to direct the Secretary of Transportation to study the feasibility of constructing a rapid rail transit line between the Metrorail station terminal in West Falls Church and Dulles International Airport. My Virginia colleague, Senator PAUL TRIBLE, is introducing a companion measure in the U.S. Senate and Congressman STAN PARRIS and Senator JOHN WARNER are joining us in our efforts.

The study will examine various rail modes, including but not limited to heavy rail, light rail, monorail and magnetic levitation systems.

I believe that this legislation is an important step in laying the groundwork to accommodate increased demand for adequate and responsive ground transportation to and from Dulles Airport—the Washington metropolitan area's airport of the future.

Many recent developments have focused Federal commitment on encouraging use of Dulles. The 1981 Metropolitan Washington Airports Policy set limits on growth at National Airport. Refinements of the policy are now being considered and will likely speed the transfer of future growth to Dulles. The master plan for Dulles is currently being updated and is expected to include plans for expanding the airport's facilities to accommodate the anticipated growth. Even today we are witnessing significant growth at Dulles. New airline service has been added and passenger use of Dulles is increasing on an average of 16 percent monthly.

These developments, coupled with the fact that 80 percent of the region's growth is occurring outside the beltway in the Dulles corridor, underscore the need to begin planning now for a rail line to accommodate passenger growth and accessibility at Dulles. We have unique opportunity also in this study to examine whether such a rail system could also help alleviate the growing traffic problems in western Fairfax Country, Va., by providing commuter stops at several locations along the route.

It is important to note that the right-of-way down the median strip of the Dulles Access Highway has been reserved by the FAA for possible future use for a mass transit rail system. Also, the road was graded with this prospect in mind, and enough space was provided under the overpasses.

The legislation will call upon DOT to review various rail systems. Each must be examined for capital and operational costs, efficiency, convenience, capacity, and demand. One example of a system with a potential for success in this area is light rail transit (LRT). Such a system is in use in San Diego, where the LRT was completed on time and under budget, with 75 percent of its operating costs recovered at the farebox.

Throughout the past decade, Congress has considered several bills calling for extension of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority's Metrorail system to Dulles. While some of those bills have been approved by one House of the Congress, none has passed both the House and Senate. Numerous studies of extending Metrorail or establishing alternate rail modes to Dulles also have been conducted by several different groups, including WMATA, highlighting the interest and support for some type of rail service to the airport.

I believe it is time to update past efforts and look to the future with one study that can then be the basis for action to make rapid rail to Dulles a reality if proved feasible. I look forward to working with my colleagues to speed passage of this legislation.

The introduced legislation follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the National Capital Transportation Act of 1969 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"STUDY OF RAPID TRANSIT LINE TO DULLES AIRPORT

"SEC. 17. (a) The Secretary of Transportation shall study the feasibility of constructing a rail rapid transit line between the West Falls Church, Virginia, station of the Washington, D.C. metrorail system and Dulles International Airport in Virginia. The study shall include, but need not be limited to, a study of the feasibility of heavy rail, light rail, monorail, and magnetic levitation systems. The Secretary shall study the feasibility of each such system with and without intermediate stops.

"(b) The Secretary shall complete the study required by subsection (a) and transmit the results thereof to Congress not later than one year after the date of enactment of this section.".●

H.R. 1176

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to repeal the sunset date on the mortgage revenue bond program.

As you know, Congress failed to extend this essential program last year in spite of overwhelming congressional support for mortgage revenue bonds. The legislation to repeal the December 31, 1983 sunset date, H.R. 1176, garnered the support of 334 House Members. However, the bill was not considered on its own merits but was, unfortunately, included in H.R. 4170, the Tax Reform Act, which failed to receive a rule in the House due to controversial provisions unrelated to the mortgage revenue bond program.

Mr. Speaker, it is critical that Congress address the extension of this vital program immediately. As we all well know, affordability is the major obstacle to the dream of homeownership for millions of Americans. For example, in my home State of California, you must earn at least $31,000 to purchase an average-priced home. Only 25 percent of Californians earn that amount. Thanks to mortgage revenue bonds, many Californians with incomes below $31,000 have been able to finance homes. In fact, in 1982 the median income of State mortgage revenue bond program beneficiaries was $23,511, and approximately 200,000 of these middle-income earners were able to purchase a home because of single family mortgage revenue bonds.

In addition to increasing the affordability of homes, mortgage revenue bonds also provide jobs—nearly 100,000 in 1983—and taxes to Federal, State and local governments—approximately $800 million in 1983—generated by the construction of new housing units. The minimal revenue loss to the Federal Government as a result of the tax-exempt status of the bonds is, I believe, a small price to pay for the numerous benefits reaped by millions of Americans through the single family mortgage revenue bond program. Now that economic recovery is well underway and unemployment is nearly under control, we must not stifle further economic growth in our Nation by failing to extend this important program.

I encourage all of my colleagues to join me in supporting and urging congressional action on legislation to repeal the sunset date on the single family mortgage revenue bond program.●

HOUSTON MISSING CHILDREN PROGRAM A GREAT SUCCESS

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, the national incidence of missing children is a stunning and frightening problem. Each year some 1.5 to 1.8 million children are missing from their homes. Approximately 50,000 of those missing children are the victims of serious accidents or foul play.

Responding to the tragedy of missing children, Congress passed the Missing Children Act in September of 1982. The act was designed to encourage the Federal Bureau of Investigation to utilize specific information such as fingerprints, blood types and other identifying characteristics which are essential in the identification of missing children.

Enlarging the FBI Crime Information Center's vital statistics file is only half the battle. Parents must possess their children's fingerprints and other vital statistics to benefit from that change.

As a part of the President's private sector initiative, the Federal ACTION Agency initiated six private sector pilot projects to lay the groundwork for a nationwide missing children program push. Houston was selected as one of those pilot projects. Zoe Laurence, the current director of community education for the Sheldon Independent School District, was selected to serve as the coordinator for the Houston missing children program.

Zoe organized what I believe will become a model program across the Nation to provide parents with records of their children's fingerprints and other identifying characterics. With the assistance of Houston area law enforcement agencies, various civic groups and the financial support of Tennaco, Exxon, and Brown & Root Corps., the Houston missing children program fingerprinted over 15,000 Houston children. In addition, Zoe provided information, materials and technical assistance to establish ongoing fingerprinting programs in Houston area schools and libraries.

Under the capable leadership of Zoe Laurence, the Houston missing children pilot program was a great success. I believe this program has once again shown that private sector initiatives can work and should be encouraged.

I commend Zoe Laurence for a job well done. Her dedication and sense of civic duty in volunteering to organize such a large-scale project for no monetary gain are rare. I thank Zoe Laurence and I am sure the parents of Houston thank Zoe Laurence. If her efforts help even one missing child, they will have been worthwhile.●

NATIONAL CREDIT UNION ADMINISTRATION REDUCES FEES

HON. CHALMERS P. WYLIE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to note that the National Credit Union Administration has slashed by 30 percent the operating fees it will require in 1984 from Federal credit unions. This brings to 40 percent the total fee reductions credit unions have received from NCUA over the past 2 years.

Thanks to streamlined operations, NCUA will need less to finance its activities next year. As a result, $6 million, which NCUA would have collected under the old fee plan, will not be needed by the agency and will remain in credit unions. The 1983 and 1984 fee cuts are the first since NCUA began an operating-fee method of assessment 5 years ago. Previously, fees had risen every year—9 percent in 1980, 8 percent in 1981, and 7.5 percent in 1982.

Continued cost-cutting efforts at NCUA, coupled with a projection for robust (20.5 percent) asset growth in 1983, increased earnings on NCUA investments, and a high level of productivity by NCUA staff are key elements that made a second consecutive operating-fee cut possible.

The impact of the 30-percent cut will be substantial. To illustrate, the House credit union, Wright Patman Congressional Federal Credit Union, would have paid an estimated 1984 operating fee of approximately $10,845 based on midyear assets of $35.9 million. With the 30-percent cut, our credit union will pay an estimated $7,623, a reduction of $3,222. The 1984 fee will be based on assets at yearend.

Mr. Speaker, my congratulations to the National Credit Union Administration and its Chairman, Edgar F. Callahan, for a job well done in reducing this burden for our Nation's Federal credit unions.●

BICENTENNIAL OF TREATIES OF PARIS AND VERSAILLES

HON. DON SUNDQUIST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, last fall more than 200 members of the Daughters of the American Revolution and several other distinguished Americans including Senator JOHN WARNER, Mrs. Charles Robb and Mrs. Douglass MacArthur made an historic trip to Paris to participate in the commemoration of the bicentennial of the signing of the Treaties of Paris and Versailles. Also attending the events was Mrs. Walter Hughey King, president general of the National Society Daughters of the American Revolution. Although the bicentennial year has passed, I felt that my colleagues might still benefit from the important historical background and timely comments in portions of this speech Mrs. King delivered on this grand occasion last year at the American Church in Paris.

The speech follows:

TREATIES OF PARIS AND VERSAILLES

We feel this Treaty of Paris was, and is, so important to the United States, and hence worthy of this splendid outflow of emotion, pageanty, international attention and good will, plus the time and effort of countless citizens of several Nations.

Historians properly describe it as the 3rd most important paper of American history, the other two being the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution itself. Without the Treaty of Paris, one could say that the Declaration of Independence was only a piece of "Campaign rhetoric" that never became reality, and without the Treaty the Constitution would not have been written at all. Thus you see its claim to big 3 status is indeed well founded.

The 1783 Treaty of Paris provided a solution and a final answer to the questions of American political independence and territorial integrity. It is not only the first and most important treaty of the United States ever signed, but it is probably the most successful and permanent treaty any nation ever signed. Dozens of other treaties have been solemnly signed in Paris by many nations. Most of those other treaties have been cosigned to the dustbins of history, and even their empires have passed away. But this Treaty of Paris has remained intact, in force, relevant, and permanent. This Treaty's two-century lifespan perpetuates not only its no-compromise, hardline provisions, but the friendship of the warring nations that signed it.

In 1780-83, America was fortunate to have men who were equal to their mighty mission. Their task was to persuade England to accept our independence, to recognize our Thirteen Colonies as a sovereign nation, and to accede to our mastery over a mass of territory twice as large as the Thirteen Colonies themselves, and to make sure that those who died to make America a free and independent nation did not die in Vain.

The Founding Fathers in Paris on behalf of American goals, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and John Jay, were elected by Congress to serve as Peace Commissioners. In 1783, Franklin was 77 years old, and for a time in 1782, he was the sole negotiator; he was famous for getting along well with French; his friendship with Foreign Minister Vergennes was legendary.

In devising the strategy for victory-without-compromise, Franklin listed four "necessary" points, as well as four "advisable" ones, which could also be described as "talking points" or "throwaways." Franklin even proposed that the British cede Canada to us. However, the American Commissioners considered their "necessary" goals as nonnegotiable, and every one was included in the Definitive Treaty of Peace.

England recognized the United States as "free, sovereign and independent states,"; the King relinquished forever all claims to American property. The treaty ordained "A firm and perpetual Peace" between England and the United States.

The Treaty established truly generous boundaries for the new nation: Canada on the north, the middle of the Mississippi River on the west, and Florida on the south. This territory gave us more than 500 million new acres of lands, and about double the size of the Thirteen Colonies which had fought the Revolution.

The treaty established the right of Americans to fish off of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia; it agreed that creditors on either side should not be interfered with in the recovery of all bona fide debts; prohibited future confiscations; required the cessation of all hostilities, the speedy withdrawal of all British troops, and the release of all prisoners; and agreed that the Mississippi River would always remain free and open to both England and the United States.

Truly, the terms were a magnificant accomplishment for our peacemakers. Yet their vision continued; they stated their belief that if America were to fulfill its goal of becoming a great new nation, it would have to begin by acting like one, even when it was new, small, and weak. Their words have meaning and advice for us even today; they stated:

"Since we have assumed a place in the political system, let us move like a primary and not a secondary planet." How right they were! And today I wish we'd stop being so hesitant and apologetic when we act to defend ourselves and the things in which we believe.

Of all the international treaties known to me, this Definitive Treaty of Paris of 1783 has been the most lasting, and has produced the greatest blessings to the world as a whole. It gave America the opportunity to prove that a constitutional republic, based on God-given rights, can flourish and endure in a changing world. Our land has been an example to many others, from the very start; that is why I consider this Treaty so important.●

DANGERS TO PEACE

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 8, 1984

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I are all too aware of the dangers to peace posed by President Assad and his Soviet backers. Blame for the violence and unrest in Lebanon can generally be directed at Syria, which has 50,000 troops in Lebanon, occupies more than half the country, and has strong back-up forces behind its own lines which include Soviet troops and the latest in Soviet technology and weaponry.

Syria has also been behind much of the terror and assassination in the region. It provided refuge and expertise to the Iranian extremist group which claimed responsibility for killing 241 U.S. Marine peacekeepers in Beirut, and also maintains ties with the Palestine Liberation Organization and other terrorist groups.
